CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

Such a case would present an instance of open nullification of the State and Federal laws that can not be presumed; but I would have no doubt in such a case that the Senate would have ample power to change the rule prescribed by the statute and admit the person elected to his seat.

I think that answers the Senator from Oregon.

This power is, in its very nature, inherent and exclusive in the Senate; but we must not go in search of difficulties and hunt for faults in a law, or for anomalous constructions, or difficult attitudes in which questions can be presented. We should search, rather, for the simple, easy, common-sense method of carrying into execution the powers of the Constitution, and apply to it such a construction as the people who formed it intended should be applied.

It must not be supposed that they anticipated quirks, quibbles, and hairsplittings on great constitutional questions, but that, on the contrary, they anticipated a sober construction of the fundamental law, not an improper but a proper construction, and one that would carry out the full scheme of our dual form of government.

Mr. President, I will notice the carefully prepared report of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections only far enough to enter my dissent from some of the conclusions there reached, although I adopt much of its reasoning and much of what the minority say.

In declaring that the Delaware senate had paramount and exclusive jurisdiction to adjudge the qualifications of William T. Watson to act and vote as a senator, it is said:

> Whether they exercised such jurisdiction or not, the Senate of the United States has no jurisdiction in the premises.

I do not concur in this conclusion. I think it perfectly competent for the Senate of the United States, in determining the status of Mr. Du Pont, to inquire into and determine whether the body from which he received his certificate was the legally constituted joint convention or assembly of the legislature of Delaware. There are doubtless certain things which are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislature, and which may be said to have been put at rest or foreclosed by their action, or possibly by their inaction, thus precluding us from inquiring into them; but as we are charged with the exclusive duty of determining whether Mr. Du Pont has been legally elected to the United States Senate from that State and with protecting the Senate from the invasion of those not legally elected to it, and assuring ourselves that he who asks for a seat here has been legally elected and is justly entitled to it, we have jurisdiction to that extent at least to inquire into the legality of the organization from which he claims to have received his commission. In no other way can the just and legal balance between the States and the United States be preserved and the purposes of our Government carried out.

A State, as an integral portion of the Union, is entitled to representation in either House of Congress, but its representatives must be elected in conformity with the fundamental and statutory laws. In the nature of things we are the final judges whether or not the law has been complied with, and therefore whether the State has put itself in an attitude to entitle it to representation in the particular instance. We can not escape this duty. It is clearly devolved upon us by the Constitution, by the very framework and theory of the Government, and it is a power that is exercised almost daily.

I have not at any time since beginning the examination of this case considered it difficult of correct determination, although it is highly important in the consequences that may follow our judgment.

Since attempting to examine it, it has appeared to me to be clear that Mr. Watson, upon the death of Governor Marvil, had simply added to his duties as speaker of the senate, for the time being, those of governor, and that he discharged or exercised the latter entirely by virtue of his office of speaker. I am unable to view the question in any other light, and I think this conclusion is established beyond reasonable doubt by the language and policy of the Delaware constitution.

Mr. President, this case presents a pure question of law. There is nothing of passion or sentiment in it. If the State of Delaware has properly elected Mr. Du Pont to a seat in this Chamber, he should be promptly and cheerfully seated; if it has not, in the interest of good government, both State and national, it becomes our duty to exclude him until such time as he may come to us with proper credentials.

I have not noticed nor shall I notice the many queries and suppositious cases and propositions that have been presented in this case. I do not regard them as possessing any importance. We should never discuss a great constitutional question in the atmosphere of awkward and suppositious statements that may or may not arise: we should discuss it in the light of the facts presented, in the light of the great cardinal truth that it was the honest and patriotic intention of the framers of the constitutions, who were themselves common men, to present to the people governments simple of construction and easy of execution; governments that would be practical in the hands of honest, patriotic men, rather than those that would be capable of being made anomalous in the hands of skillful lawyers and statesmen seeking merely for the supremacy of a particular political party.

In this light I have examined the case, and I have reached a conclusion which is, to my mind at least, satisfactory, and which will guide my vote. I affirm, therefore—

First. That Mr. Watson was at no time governor of the State of Delaware, but after the death of Governor Marvil simply discharged or exercised the duties of that office ex officio—that is, by virtue of his office of speaker of the senate—and that he had a clear right to participate in the deliberations of the joint convention of the general assembly that voted for the election of a United States Senator and to vote; and Second. Having possessed that right, and having participated in the deliberations of the joint convention, 15 votes were not a majority of 30, and Mr. Du Pont has not received a majority of the votes of the members of both houses present and voting, as required by law, and is not, therefore, entitled to a seat in this Chamber.

I do not regard his title as possessing any higher, greater, or more sacred character than would be the title of any other citizen of the State who had not received a vote. He has no better right than such an individual would have; and having reached this conclusion my duty is plain. I will at the proper time vote against his being recognized or seated as a member of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be until Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. LODGE. Before that motion is put, in the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], I think I must object. The Senator from Ohio is very desirous of going on with the conference report on the Cuban resolution and getting it out of the way of the other business of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Take the vote.

Mr. LODGE. I trust no action will be taken by the Senate until the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committe on Foreign Relations, returns.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Cullom,	McBride,	Sewell,
Bacon,	Davis,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Bate,	Dubois,	Martin,	Shoup,
Blanchard,	Faulkner,	Mills,	Smith,
Brice,	Gallinger,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Squire,
Brown,	Gear,	Mitchell, Wis.	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Teller,
Butler,	Gray,	Nelson,	Tillman,
Caffery,	Hale,	Pasco,	Turpie,
Call,	Harris,	Peffer,	Vest,
Cannon,	Hill,	Perkins,	Vilas,
Carter,	Irby,	Platt,	Walthall,
Chandler,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,	Wetmore,
Chilton,	Kyle,	Pugh,	White,
Cockrell,	Lodge,	Roach,	Wolcott.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish the Senator from Maryland would modify his motion to the extent of permitting the Senate to meet to-morrow at the usual hour for the consideration of pension bills alone. ["Oh, no!"] Evidently there is dissent from that proposition, but a great many Senators have made the request of me for that arrangement. I am content with any action the Senate may take.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLS. Of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the motion to adjourn over will not be agreed to unless we can make some agreement as to the time of taking a vote on the Cuban question. It has now been under consideration for some time, and I hope, and I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for such an agreement, that the vote may be taken on Monday not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not insist even in asking for that. Nearly all of the time of the debate thus far, more than two-thirds of it, has been taken by the Committee on Foreign Relations or those in sympathy with their report. There are several Senators upon the other side who have had no opportunity whatever to discuss the question and who are desirous of doing so. We were caught before by an agreement, and I helped myself to get it, not knowing what the report would be, by fixing an hour for taking the question, and everybody was cut off. I for one can not agree at present upon any time being fixed until Senators shall have had an opportunity to be heard; and I do not think the Senator from Ohio, considering how much of the time his committee and the Senators in sympathy with the committee have taken, cutting out pretty much everyone on the other side, ought to ask that a time should now be fixed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand the motion before the Senate is that when it adjourn to-day it be to meet at a fixed time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask if the motion is debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not debatable.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I call for a vote on the motion. The debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. MCBRIDE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I should vote "nay," if he were present.

Mr. SQUIRE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. He not being present, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 42, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—42.

Allen,	Davis,	McMillan,	Stewart,
Bacon,	Dubois,	Martin,	Teller,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Mitchell, Wis.	Thurston,
Brice,	Gibson,	Morrill,	Turpie,
Burrows,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Butler,	Gray,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Caffery,	Hale,	Platt,	Wetmore,
Cannon,	Harris,	Pugh,	White,
Carter,	Hill,	Roach,	Wolcott.
Chilton,	Irby,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Smith,

NAYS—22.

Baker,	Cullom,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Shoup,
Blanchard,	Frye,	Morgan,	Tillman,
Brown,	Gallinger,	Nelson,	Vest,
Call,	Kyle,	Perkins,	Wilson.
Chandler,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Clark,	Mills,	Sherman,

NOT VOTING—25.

Aldrich,	Gear,	Lindsay,	Quay,
Allison,	George,	McBride,	Squire,
Berry,	Gordon,	Mantle,	Voorhees,
Blackburn,	Hansbrough,	Murphy,	Warren.
Cameron,	Hawley,	Palmer,
Daniel,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,
Elkins,	Jones, Nev.	Pritchard,

So the motion was agreed to.

WAR IN CUBA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the Cuban resolutions.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, when I concluded my remarks yesterday evening I was discussing the question of the belligerence of an insurgent people at war with the mother country. I had attempted to show that the exercise of this power is lodged exclusively in the Executive. I shall not recapitulate the arguments that I made to establish that conclusion. I find that but a small difference exists between the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and myself on this point. I will read an extract from his speech of yesterday:

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, all these resolutions of the Senate attempt to do, confining themselves within what I believe, and a majority of this Senate I think believe, is within the sphere of its power, is to express its opinion, and in expressing this opinion of the Senate and asking the concurrence of the House of Representatives, giving expression also to what we believe to be the opinion of the great mass of the people of this country. Having done so much—it seems to me that we could do no less—having expressed that opinion, we have left to the executive branch of this Government what undeniably belongs to it solely; that is, to possess itself of the requisite information and to act in accord so far as it may with this opinion of the two Houses and the opinion of the American people so far as it may think the opinion of the Houses voices the opinion of the American people. But upon that branch of the Government rests the responsibility, and I do not complain that it should proceed with caution, with circumspection, and with a desire, holding in its hands perhaps the issues of peace and war, to do only that which, from every point of view, internationally, morally, and patriotically, it is its duty to do.

But there is no reason, Mr. President, why we should here in the Senate abandon the form of resolution and of expression of opinion which we have so deliberately adopted. There is no reason why, having first acted in this matter, we should accept the substitute resolution offered by the House of Representatives, our own resolutions, prior in point of time, being contemptuously swept aside, and adopt other language and resolutions expressing a different attitude on the part of the Government of the United States and of the Congress of the United States from that adopted by the resolutions of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Would not the passage of either of these resolutions be a sufficient warrant, guaranty, or indorsement of the general proposition contained therein to enable the President to proceed to recognize the belligerent rights of Cuba or to recognize the independence of Cuba, and to proceed in that line without any further action if the President shall feel disposed to do so?

Mr. GRAY. I think he would be justified in taking that course after satisfying himself as to the facts.

This extract from the speech of the Senator from Delaware quoted by me shows that he is of opinion that the power to decide ultimately upon the fact of belligerence resides with the Executive and with the Executive solely. He, however, says that the expression of opinion on the part of the Senate and the House is a proper thing to do, and that that expression of opinion has been deliberately made, and presumably, although he does not say so, under the sanction of international law. It occurs to me that in a question of pure, simple fact, a question of physical fact, a loose opinion is entirely out of place; that even a deliberate opinion which does not amount to a firm conclusion, which can not govern the conduct or prescribe the action either of an individual or of a State, is not such an expression as the Senate and the House of Representatives ought to make in regard to the delicate matter of the relations existing between a mother country and certain insurgents warring against the power of that mother country.

This is not a matter of opinion on a domestic question. It is a matter relating to facts of a foreign character, and becomes therefore a sort of international opinion; and in all matters with respect to the relations existing between this Government and the government of a foreign country we are to proceed with that caution and deliberation which the intercourse between independent States justifies and demands.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] suggests to me the question whether or not we ought to be denouncing upon the floor of the Senate the manner in which a foreign nation conducts its affairs. I say emphatically no. For one I not only denounce this interference with the conduct of a foreign country in relation to its own subjects, but I emphatically protest against these attacks made upon the character of a foreign country; against these epithets applied to a foreign country which have been hurled right and left during the debate on the pending question by Senators upon this floor. I take no part or lot in such denunciations, and I characterize them as entirely out of place and beneath the dignity of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I will venture to quote from our own authority—I call it our own authority—the views of a distinguished international author in our country, Mr. Dana. Speaking of the recognition of belligerency, he says:

If it—

The country recognizing—

issues a formal declaration of belligerent rights prematurely, or in a contest with which it has no complexity, it is a gratuitous and unfriendly act. If the parent government complains of it, the complaint must be made upon one of these grounds. To decide whether the recognition was uncalled for and premature requires something more than a consideration of proximate facts and the overt and formal acts of the contending parties. The foreign state is bound and entitled to consider the preceding history of the parties, the magnitude and completeness of the political and military organizations and preparations on each side, the probable extent of the conflict by sea and land, the probable extent and rapidity of its development, and, above all, the probability that its own merchant vessels, naval officers, and consuls may be precipitated into sudden and difficult complications abroad.

Now, it is not contended that this recognition of belligerency has the force of law; that it binds the Government of the United States; that it binds the President of the United States. But, Mr. President, behind this resolution lurks a great danger. These resolutions have been accompanied with commentaries of a very warlike and aggressive character. The interpretation placed on the resolutions in debate by Senators on this floor goes beyond the point of a mere empty declaration and almost invites a war, almost amounts to an insult to Spain, and a gratuitous declaration of belligerency is characterized by the author who I have quoted as a gratuitous insult.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal said in regard to the evidence to establish this belligerency. As a matter of course, everybody acknowledges open, notorious, historical facts. Everybody knows and notices that there is a war in Cuba. Everybody is presumed to be aware, and every government must take official cognizance of the fact that there is a revolution going on in the Island of Cuba; that hosts of armed men on either side of this controversy are waging a war, some say of extermination, certainly of devastation, in that lovely isle. We must take cognizance of the prevailing government in Spain. These facts are undisputed.

But when it comes down to an issue of fact, when it comes down to the question of belligerency or not, we must proceed according to the methods recognized among civilized men to establish or overthrow that fact. The advocates of these resolutions, while they admit and concede, at least so far as the Senator from Delaware is concerned, that they will have no binding force, and refer to the Executive as the ultimate authority to decide upon the question of belligerency, yet parade a multitude of facts from every quarter; facts that have no sort of bearing upon the issue before us; facts that would be discarded without the slightest hesitation if offered before the most ignorant justice of the peace to establish any matter of fact. Yet these facts are paraded with a great show of strength and dwelt on with great persistence to establish that very condition of things which some of them concede our declaration as to which amounts to absolutely nothing.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to know why we should make this declaration. If it is a declaration that binds nobody, if it is a declaration that has no force, why is it insisted upon with such pertinacity? Why are we called on to review not only the history of the present insurrection, but to review the whole past history of the conduct of the last rebellion in Cuba, dating back nearly thirty years, commencing in 1868 and only winding up in 1878? Why are the alleged atrocities of General Weyler paraded to the public? Why is Spanish history raked up from the time that Torquemada tortured his victims to show the ferocious character of the Spaniards? Why is every incident of this kind dwelt upon with so much vigor, so much force, so much persistence, if it is not to inflame the warlike passions of the American people and embroil us in a controversy with a friendly State?

This is one of the reasons why I object to considering the question of belligerency on any other ground and from any other point of view than that sanctioned by international law. If we are to pass judgment at all upon this question, we ought to do so, in the language of the Senator from Delaware, deliberately, conscientiously, being well informed of every fact necessary to induce a correct conclusion and judgment in the premises.

It is confessed that there are no facts of a character that would be called testimony in any sort of a court or before any sort of a tribunal charged with the investigation of matters of fact, and yet we are called upon here to express a loose opinion, to give a conjecture, to make a supposition, to form a conclusion or a judgment without that degree of proof which induces a certainty of knowledge upon a matter of this gravity. Upon a matter touching our foreign relations with a friendly power; upon a matter coming within the scope of international law, we have no right, in my opinion, to be expressing opinions of this grave character without the sanction and without the warrant of that sort of proof which the Executive himself must have before him in order to bring his mind to a correct conclusion upon the point at issue.

Mr. President, I will revert somewhat to the position that I took yesterday in regard to the exclusive power of the Executive to pass upon the matter of fact of belligerency. It is only a matter of fact. Where do we get our information, and how do we get it? Whenever any information is desired in regard to foreign affairs a polite request is sent by one or both Houses to the President of the United States requesting him, if not incompatible with the public interests, that he shall give such and such facts as are required. He may withhold the facts. He may think that the condition of affairs is such as not to warrant a publication of the facts. With him and solely with him rests the responsibility of withholding those facts or of giving them to Congress as he may see fit.

How, therefore, could we get the facts if the President considered it to be incompatible with the public interests to give them to us. Shall we consider the tales that have been told in the newspapers; the blood-curdling statements that are incredible upon their face, the narratives of battles which never occurred? Why, Mr. President, I do not believe that any sensible man, any conscientious man, would in a matter affecting his own personal interests venture a judgment upon any such facts as have been detailed in the public press in regard to the conduct of the war in Cuba.

We know that the sympathies of our people go out to the Cubans. We know that a helping hand is held out across the Gulf of Mexico from the shores of our own Republic to those patriots. We know that sympathy runs there in a constant stream. We know as a matter of fact that in the present condition of mind of our people they are ready to grasp at any piece of evidence that is favorable to the Cuban cause and accept it as gospel truth. That being the case, we ought to move with much more caution, with much more deliberation than if it were a case of belligerency in a country with which we had hardly any communication or with the efforts of whose people to achieve their independence we had but that abstract interest and abstract sympathy which the American people feel for all nations struggling to achieve their independence. But in the matter of Cuba right at our doors, with public sympathy going out to those people on every hand, with our people prone to believe every statement hostile to Spain and favorable to the insurgents, is it possible that the Senate of the United States would take evidence such as is procured from the newspapers, given by overzealous correspondents and Cuban sympathizers, as establishing the facts upon which this great Government ought to act in a matter of this momentous kind? That is the sort of testimony and that is the sort of proof that is offered to prove the fact of belligerency.

Mr. President, in regard to general, historic, undisputed facts the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives and the President take cognizance without proof; but in regard to those of a contested character we must get them from the accredited representatives of the United States in Cuba. I know of no other source unless the President of the United States send a special commissioner, charged with the duty of ascertaining the facts of the situation and report to the Executive.

The Executive sent Mr. Mann with credentials as commissioner to investigate fully the situation of affairs in Hungary and report to the President of the United States. The declaration was made by President Taylor in his message to Congress that if the facts justified it, if the Hungarians had established a de facto government, he would immediately recognize that country as an independent sovereignty. So it could be done in the case of belligerency just as well as in the case of a de facto government. I think, sir, it is absolutely necessary, before we pass upon this question, that we shall have such facts as will warrant us in coming to an honorable and a just conclusion in the premises.

Mr. President, the range that this discussion has taken has embraced a great many questions, and the resolutions themselves invite this broad range of discussion. As to the middle resolution there can be no great objection to it] It is simply a resolution declaring—

That Congress deplores the destruction of life and property caused by the war now waging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest, equally in the interests of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations, would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba, it is the sense of Congress that the Government of the United States should use its good offices and friendly influence to that end.

I see no particular objection to that resolution. It only expresses a desire upon our part to use our good offices to bring about the establishment of permanent independence in Cuba. It is an offer of friendly mediation. That offer may be rejected, but it certainly will not hurt the pride of Spain. It will not infringe any part of the international law should this resolution pass. It affects no relations as between the Cuban insurgents and the Kingdom of Spain. It simply announces our readiness and willingness to be a mediator in bringing about the cessation of hostilities and in attempting to establish, through our friendly aid, of course with the consent of Spain, a permanent republic in the Island of Cuba. As to the belief that it is the only permanent solution of the contest, it is held by most of the people of the United States. But whether it be so or not, there is nothing in this resolution of an offensive character, nothing whatever that would hurt the pride or insult the dignity of Spain or any other country to whom it might be addressed.

I believe, in common, I think, with the majority of our people, that it is a matter of impossibility that the dominion of Spain should last in perpetuity over this island, 3,000 miles away from it. It is one of the richest islands, if not the richest, in the Caribbean Sea. In extent of country, in fertility of soil, in diversity of production, it is unequaled in the islands of the West Indies. When that island becomes more populous, when it becomes imbued through its length and breadth with the spirit of independence, in my opinion its independence is at hand. I do not think that there is, from the statistics, any showing that the Government of Spain derives any great revenue from the island. I believe it is rather a costly possession. But that does not concern the issue before us. It only goes to show that if the island is not remunerative to Spain, if it does not place money in her coffers, then the Spanish hold upon that island is necessarily relaxed, and considering the character of the island, considering the distance from Spain, considering the proximity to the United States, and considering the influence always of our republican institutions, it occurs to me that the time is near at hand, not far removed in the future, when the independence of the island will be a thing accomplished.

But in the meantime, Mr. President, let us hold fast to the policy that has heretofore governed the United States. Our policy has been one of strict noninterference. We have governed our conduct in all our relations with foreign people strictly under the rule of international law, and have heretofore embroiled ourselves with no foreign power and have given none of them any just cause of complaint.

There is no sort of parallel between the Southern Confederacy and the Island of Cuba. We had every single muniment of title to belligerency, and it was necessary on account of the commerce between Great Britain and the recognizing countries that they should recognize a condition of belligerency. We occupied a vast territory. We gave battle in open field time after time, and blood flowed in torrents. We had a capital of the Confederacy and a capital of each State in the Confederacy. We had every single muniment laid down in international law from which foreign nations could rightly and justly judge that there was a condition of belligerency existing in the Southern Confederacy. But in the correspondence of that time, in the laws laid down at that time by Mr. Seward and those who administered our affairs subsequent to Mr. Seward during the rebellion in Cuba under President Grant, we have built up a code of international law as to belligerence founded upon the doctrines of the text writers and the usages that obtain among the civilized nations, and we are estopped to assail that law. We are estopped to do any act against our deliberate position assumed in regard to belligerency.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit an interruption?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. I understood yesterday a suggestion to be made by the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], which was adopted by the Senator from Louisiana, that in the Prize Cases, in which was considered the recognition of the belligerency of the Confederacy, it had been decided that the President alone possessed the jurisdiction to make an effective recognition of belligerency. That is too strong a statement of the effect of that opinion. The Prize Cases involved this question (and it tallies exactly with the proposition that I laid down yesterday), whether the President might for himself make a recognition of belligerency when it was necessary to do so in the discharge of some other constitutional function which belonged to him. An examination will show that the recognition of belligerency in that case was sustained under that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to confer upon the President the power to call forth the militia to suppress insurrection. Congress passed certain statutes, one in 1795 and another in 1807, touching the subject. The decision of the Supreme Court in that case does not seem to be predicated on an independent prerogative existing in the President to recognize belligerency as to foreign nations, but it was under the constitutional clause to which I have alluded and his duties thereunder as Commander in Chief. Indeed, in that case it was not necessary to decide the question at all, as the facts show that Congress afterwards specifically confirmed the actions of the President, which were treated as implying a recognition of belligerency.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; I am perfectly well aware that Congress ratified the action of the President of the United States in all warlike matters relating to the Confederacy.

Mr. PLATT. But is there any instance in which Congress has ever undertaken to accord belligerent rights to anyone?

Mr. CAFFERY. Does the Senator address that question to the Senator from Texas, or to myself?

Mr. PLATT. I am addressing it to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir; there is no instance whatever where Congress has ever undertaken to acknowledge belligerency.

Mr. PLATT. So far as I have been able to examine the history of Congress, it has never been done by Congress.

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator know, or can he cite any authority, or offer any reason which authorizes the Supreme Court of the United States to declare a question of belligerency?

Mr. CAFFERY. I can offer no reason why the Supreme Court should recognize belligerency, because none can be adduced. The Supreme Court can not recognize belligerency.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish, then, to make this suggestion to the Senator. Is not the power to declare or recognize the belligerency or political independence of a people purely a political question with which the Supreme Court has no concern?

Mr. CAFFERY. It is.

Mr. ALLEN. Therefore anything that the Supreme Court may have said on that subject is mere words?

Mr. CHILTON. No; the Supreme Court recognizes the fact that it is a question for the political department of the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. But the point is to determine what constitutes the political department of the Government. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to claim that the Chief Executive of the country was vested with the exclusive jurisdiction to recognize belligerency, and he quoted as authority the opinion in the Prize Cases. But I have called attention to the fact that the opinion referred to was predicated upon a specific clause of our Constitution, to wit, that which governed the suppression of insurrection. It has no application to the recognition of belligerency of a foreign country, people, or district.

While I am making that suggestion I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to another point. I understood him yesterday afternoon to criticise the accuracy of my analysis of the case of Kennett vs. Chambers, 14 Howard, which involved the question of the recognition of the independence of the Texas Republic. I quoted from memory only, and stated that the deduction which would be naturally drawn from the decision in that case was that the duty of recognizing belligerency belonged to the treaty-making power; that is, the President and the Senate. Since the adjournment of yesterday I have looked at that case, and I find the following language, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator:

> Whether Texas had or had not at that time become an independent state was a question for that department of our Government exclusively which is charged with our foreign relations. And until the period when that department recognized it as an independent state the judicial tribunals of the country were bound to consider the old order of things as having continued and to regard Texas as a part of the Mexican territory. And if we undertook to inquire whether she had not in fact become an independent, sovereign state before she was recognized as such by the treaty-making power, we should take upon ourselves the exercise of political authority for which a judicial tribunal is wholly unfit, and which the Constitution has conferred exclusively upon another department. (Chief Justice Taney in Kennett vs. Chambers, 14 Howard, 50.)

Mr. ALLEN. That is the point, if the Senator will permit me, to which I directed his attention, whether it is not purely a political power with which the Supreme Court has nothing to do.

Mr. CAFFERY. Clearly so. The Supreme Court did not pass originally upon the power and has never passed originally upon the power. The Supreme Court predicates its finding of belligerency or not upon the finding of a political department of the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

Mr. CAFFERY. And that is all.

Mr. HOAR. Just as they did in the Rhode Island case as to the question, which is the true government of a State? That occurs every day upon the question, which is the true government of a State?

Mr. ALLEN. That is a rule without any exception whatever.

Mr. CHILTON. That is the same question which arose in the seal-fisheries controversy, and is a question for the political department of the Government.

Mr. CAFFERY. There is no great difference between the Senator from Texas and me. Chief Justice Taney lays down the proposition in 14 Howard, in unmistakable language, that the recognition of independence—not the recognition of belligerence—belongs exclusively to that department which has charge of our foreign relations. In another part of the decision quoted by the Senator from Texas there is a kind of loose expression of a general character that would seem to place this power in the hands of the treaty-making department. The treaty-making department of the Government is the Executive and the Senate. If, therefore, the Senator from Texas is right in assuming that this latter clause of the decision which he quotes conveys the proper law, then a concurrent resolution by the House of Representatives and the Senate is ultra vires.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from Louisiana must excuse me for interrupting him. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I merely called attention to that decision to show the lack of uniformity of judicial opinions on that question.

Mr. CAFFERY. Exactly. There is no decision, however, going to the extent of even intimating that the power to recognize belligerence belongs to any other than the treaty-making power or the executive department.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator would have understood my contention on that point if he had read my speech.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senate is included under the head of the legislative department. That is the expression used in those opinions, but the House of Representatives has nothing to do with the treaty-making power, it has nothing to do with the appointment or confirmation of ambassadors, and it is only from this expressed power that you can imply the power to recognize belligerence. The express power is to appoint ambassadors; the express power is to make treaties. The implied power from these express powers is to recognize independence or belligerence. If, therefore, that be so, the House of Representatives is excluded from any participation whatever in a resolution recognizing belligerency.

Mr. President, these resolutions, after expressing this kind hope that Spain will listen to our overtures of mediation in regard to the establishment of a permanent independent government in Cuba, go on and they contain a threat of war:

> Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba, in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples, the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention, if necessary.

I understand the word "intervention," as used here, to have its proper signification as applied to any interference by one government with the affairs of another government, and under that meaning the intervention spoken of here is an implied threat of war, for prima facie intervention is a declaration of hostilities. No nation upon earth ever permits another nation, from what cause soever it may be, to interfere with its independence; and when you interfere, whether it is for business purposes, as this resolution declares, or for any other purpose, it is prima facie a hostile act. Hall's International Law, chapter 8, section 88, reads:

> Intervention takes place when a state interferes in the relations of two other states without the consent of both or either of them, or when it interferes in the domestic affairs of another state irrespectively of the will of the latter for the purpose of either maintaining or altering the actual condition of things within it. Prima facie, intervention is a hostile act, because it constitutes an attack upon the independence of the state subjected to it.

This, in my opinion, if there were no other reason in the body of these resolutions, affords ample ground for opposition to them. Prima facie, the intervention spoken of here is a hostile act; it is a defiance cast in the teeth of Spain that whenever we think our interests require we shall be prepared to intervene, if necessary. We therefore set up to judge independent of the will of Spain, without consulting Spain in the least, to intervene in her affairs in the matters affecting her internal polity, in matters affecting her insurgent provinces, whenever we think it is necessary. That is a constant menace of war; that is a constant declaration of hostility.

The only ground which is sanctioned under international law, so far as I have read it, is a matter of pecuniary interest or is a matter of self-protection. I do not know that international law sanctions intervention in the affairs of a foreign country for the purposes of pure humanity, nor do I believe that that doctrine may sanction broadly interference on that ground. There has been but one intervention in the history of the world on account of pure humanity that I know of. There the powers of Europe, stimulated by the halo of glory encircling the most celebrated state of antiquity, to which modern civilization owes a debt it can never pay, intervened in behalf of mankind—of humanity. The case was that of Greece. That is the only instance I know. This writer upon international law states the fact that that is too slight a ground on which to predicate or base a broad tenet of international law.

From the speech of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] yesterday I will make this quotation in reference to intervention:

> The time may come when the United States will have grown so powerful that they can lay down, as of absolute authority, rules of international action upon the American Hemisphere. With this great power will come the respo sibility of interposing for humanity and liberty whenever the circumstances require it. Such a policy will be the legitimate outgrowth of the Monroe doctrine, which will be developed to guard the peace and freedom of the whole Western World.
> But we have not yet reached that time. We are strong, very strong, but we are not yet so strong in comparison with possible adversaries that they will yield to our intervention without a mighty trial of arms.

I conclude from this extract from the very eloquent and forcible speech of the Senator from Texas that he is of opinion that intervention in the affairs of the Western Hemisphere by the United States will be justified whenever our strength shall justify such intervention, and the Senator contends, or intimates, that this policy is the legitimate outgrowth of the Monroe doctrine. In neither of those propositions do I agree with my distinguished friend. I do not think that the United States can afford to establish a rule to govern her action in regard to interference in the affairs of states of this Western Hemisphere other than the ground established by the common consent of the civilized states as forming part of the code of international law, and I believe that such a step as that would be a flagrant violation of the rule of conduct which binds us internationally to observe toward all other nations that noninterference, nonintervention, in their affairs as obtains now; that the question of our strength, the question of our power, has nothing whatever to do with the matter of intervention or nonintervention. I understand, then, from this doctrine, as enunciated by the Senator from Texas, that he places the question of intervention purely upon the ground of ability to make your intervention good.

Mr. President, there are stronger grounds why we should not intervene based upon the moral tenet of this international law than any possible ground for intervention based upon the pretension of power.

I contend further that the principle enunciated has nothing whatever to do with the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine was founded, and is founded to-day, upon the principle of self-protection, and one of these writers, Mr. Woolsey, in his edition of Hall, lays it down that the question of intervention is one of political expediency whenever the power intervening thinks its institutions, thinks its safety, in peril. There can be no pretext whatever in regard to Cuba that we have or will have a right to intervene and set up our law or our pretensions in the premises, whatever they may be, on the ground of any fear that our institutions will be assailed or endangered by any internal struggle going on in that island.

If the power of the United States and its example are to spread over these contiguous countries, it must be upon the wings of peace, and not upon the pinions of war. The beneficent example of the United States has already been courted and followed in the establishment of republics south of us, and, as in the opinion that I expressed a while ago, will be established in the Island of Cuba at no very distant day; but whenever we set up a doctrine of force and strength we invite that which the United States has always deplored—a foreign war; and however much the people to the north of us and the people to the south of us may desire republican institutions, the very moment that we make an aggressive war upon the powers holding those provinces to the north and to the south and in the Caribbean Sea we bring about a spirit of animosity and hatred, even in the countries in whose behalf we interfere, that will do away with all the beneficent and benign effects of republican institutions working their own way along the smooth paths of peace.

Mr. President, I have extended my remarks on this subject quite as far as I now propose to go. I will state before I close that I have the profoundest sympathy for the struggling people of Cuba; I have the profoundest respect for all obligations, national and international; I have the profoundest regard for the welfare and the feelings of all nations with which we are at peace. I would not wantonly and causelessly bring about a breach of friendly relations between the United States and the humblest of the powers of the earth. I would respect the rights of all; I would resist encroachments from any.

In order to square and reconcile our sympathies in behalf of a people struggling for their liberty with the requirements and obligations of international law, I think we ought to content ourselves with a declaration of sympathy, just such as was embodied in the resolution offered by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and permit this great moral entity, this great code of international law, to pursue its way unobstructed and inviolate from any infraction or violation of its ordinances on our part. If there be a case of belligerence in Cuba, the President has or can have the evidence to justify his recognition of it. With him is the power and the responsibility. I am willing to place, where the Constitution, in my opinion, has placed, the exercise of this important function in the hands of the Chief Magistrate of our Republic.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I had intended to address some remarks to the Senate on this question, but I heard the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] say during the morning hour that those who are opposed to the resolutions have not yet had sufficient opportunity to be heard. I shall therefore decline to occupy the floor to-day, in order that I may give the opponents of the resolutions ample opportunity to present their views to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the advocates of imperialism and the continuance of European authority and power upon this hemisphere, and especially in the Island of Cuba, have maintained that proposition under various guises. The honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] maintained the proposition upon the idea that the people of the United States are bound by some opinions of writers upon customary proceedings between nations, under some idea of an international code, that says to the people of the United States, when the interests of civilization are concerned, when the traditional policy of the United States is set aside and counteracted, when all the sentiments and opinions of the people of this country are outraged, that they are forbidden by considerations of the consequences of possible war from asserting that which is right, asserting the principles of humanity, and asserting the duty of nations to each other as we understand it.

Such a proposition, Mr. President, is analogous to the case of a man who, passing along a highway, is thrown into the presence of an outrage upon some feebler person, of murder or of outrage in its vilest form, and who, possessing the ability and power, passes on the outside and says: "If my vital interests were affected I would interfere; I sympathize with you, but I will not interpose my hand and power at present for your protection." We would say that that man was unmanly; that he was unworthy of respect and consideration. But the advocates of Spanish rule in the Island of Cuba undertake to say that what is honorable and humane in an individual in the collective body of the people is dishonorable; that it must be governed by some fancied consideration of interest to the collective body, and the promptings of a manly, courageous, religious, humane, civilized spirit can find no place in the public policy of a people. Such a proposition has no warrant in any of the authorities which have been read here. They have no reference to such a condition of things; they have no reference to the duty which is imposed upon a sovereign State to subject her policies and her conduct to the highest considerations of humanity promoting civilization.

The honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] alluded yesterday to the results of war upon the progress of this country toward a higher civilization. The progress which a policy solely in the interest of peace would make would be a progress toward an ignominious condition of society, a progress toward an unmanliness and the education of our American people into a race whose hearts would be closed to all sympathy with the higher and the better interests of civilized man. In this case of Cuba there is no excuse for hesitation or doubt. The policy of this Government has been proclaimed in a series of State papers which have received the approval not only of the legislative department, which is the supreme power in this country, but also of the executive branch of the Government. I will call attention to what has been the utterance of the executive department of this Government, confirmed and sustained by the legislative department, and that I may not occupy too much of the time by reading these extracts from the State Department I will print them, by leave of the Senate, as a part of my remarks.

We do not speak to the Senate here, it must be understood, but we speak to the RECORD; we speak to that large, that greater, body than the Senators who vacate their seats when questions of public concern are considered; we speak to the American people, that they may be aroused to consider and decide the policy and the conditions with which the public power should be exercised in respect to the struggle of the Cubans for free and independent government.

This is a question which is second in importance to none which has ever come before this body. It is but the prelude to that greater organization which was called into life by that distinguished citizen of the United States who has passed into the shades of eternity, the Hon. James G. Blaine, when the Pan-American Congress, the only congress of the republican States, the republics of North and South America, that has ever been convened, was organized. This is the prelude of that confederation of the American republics which will assert the power of the people, the enlightened and intelligent people, over all the policies of this Government and of all the Americas.

In Executive Document No. 93, of the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, the following statement will be found:

On the 1st of August, 1862, Mr. Adams was instructed by this Government in the following words: "Did the European states which found and occupied this continent almost without effort then understand its real destiny and purposes? Have they ever yet fully understood and accepted them? Has anything but disappointment upon disappointment and disaster upon disaster resulted from their misapprehensions? After near four hundred years of such disappointments and disasters, is the way of Providence in regard to America still so mysterious that it can not be understood and confessed? Columbus, it was said, had given a new world to the Kingdoms of Castile and Leon. What has become of the sovereignty of Spain in America? Richelieu occupied and fortified a large portion of the continent, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Straits of Belle Isle. Does France yet retain that important appendage to the crown of her sovereign? Great Britain acquired a dominion here surpassing by a hundredfold in length and breadth the native realm. Has not a large portion of it been already formally resigned? To whom have those vast dominions, with those founded by the Portuguese, the Dutch, and the Swedes, been resigned but to American nations, the growth of European colonists and exiles, who have come hither, bringing with them the arts, the civilization, and the virtues of Europe? Has not the change been beneficial to society on this continent? Has it not been more beneficial even to Europe itself than continued European domination, if it had been possible, could have been? The American nations which have grown up here are free and self-governing. They have made themselves so from inherent vigor and in obedience to absolute necessity. Is it possible for European states to plunge them again into a colonial state and hold them there? Would it be desirable for them and for Europe, if it were possible? The balance of power among the nations of Europe is maintained not without numerous strong armies and frequent conflicts, while the sphere of political ambition there is bounded by the ocean which surrounds that continent. Would it be possible to maintain it at all if this vast continent, with all its populations, their resources, and their forces, should once again be brought within that sphere?

"On the contrary of all these suppositions, is it not manifest that these American nations were called into existence to be the home of freemen; that the states of Europe have been intrusted by Providence with their tutelage, but that tutelage and all its responsibilities and powers are necessarily withdrawn, to the relief and benefit of the parties and of mankind, when these parties become able to choose their own system of Government and to make and administer their own laws?"

That is the policy which was declared by Mr. Seward and which has been reiterated in every Administration of this Government; that was the declaration of the United States to France when recognizing the Juarez Government. While it was a fugitive and had been driven from Mexico the United States recognized it and demanded that the French army should retire and the French occupation be withdrawn from Mexico. Why, then, talk about the policy of this Government when that instance stands here? The Juarez Government was a rebellious government, asserting republican government against the power of the Maximilian Government, which had been established by arms and recognized by the theretofore legitimate authority of Mexico. In this language the United States declared to France that this was the home of freemen, that they recognized the Republic of Mexico and the Government of Juarez, although fugitive and without organization, and demanded upon this proposition that the army of occupation should be withdrawn by France. Why, then, do the advocates of monarchy and the preservation of despotic rule in Cuba assert that there is no precedent for this action on the part of the Congress of the United States?

The Senator from Louisiana and other Senators have alluded to the declarations in the newspapers of the outrages committed. I find in the records of the State Department, furnished by the minister of the Republic of Mexico, the distinguished and able and worthy representative of that people at that time, Mr. Romero, newspaper extract after newspaper extract presented to the American people, and presented by the Department of State to the Congress of the United States for its proper influence with them in determining the public action of this body in respect to the recognition of the Juarez Government.

But, it is asked, what have these instances of outrage to do with the question of the recognition of Cuban independence? Mr. President, is not the protection of our citizens a legitimate subject of consideration? Whence comes this idea that the question of outrage upon the American people is not to be considered by the Congress of the United States in according recognition either of belligerency or of independence to a government? Whence this idea that if our people are not safe in contact with that power upon our own shores that we have no right to bring these instances to prove that condition of things, to show that the citizens of the United States are not safe, even when protected by treaty stipulation, under the Spanish Government in that island.

Surely there can be no force in these propositions. Surely the American people will understand that the protection of the citizen who has a right under treaties to visit foreign lands and to engage in commerce and business there constitutes a necessity for the civilization of the world and for commercial intercourse; and if outrage upon outrage is committed upon citizens of the United States should it not be a subject of consideration and should it not influence the action of the Congress of the United States? If there be a country within our reach where it is desirable for us to have, and where under treaty stipulations we do have, relations of commerce, should we not act in protection to our people? If we find it necessary when there is a formidable revolt there, when there is a revolt which has sufficient permanence and stability to indicate the probability even of its final success, should we not say, "Here are the elements of strength; here is a condition of things requiring the protection of American interests, commercial interests, personal interests, interests of civilization"? And should we not recognize the fact that here is a revolt where there is a probability of success, and when sufficiently promoted a case proper for recognition of independence to be accorded to them?

Let us see as to the condition of things, and as to the probability of the truth of the statements which have been made here. Certainly no one can question the proposition that facts, circumstances, events of continuous nature, showing the character of a person or of the people of a State, give color and probability to other occurrences similar in character. When you can place your finger upon a particular individual, and you yourself, being a person of character, will say to a public functionary or to the Congress of the United States, "I know this person to be reliable; I know his character, and he states certain facts which correspond with the established course of history in relation to that people," there is evidence equal to any which can be produced.

Now, let us see what is the condition of things in reference to the Island of Cuba. What is the condition in reference to the possibility, the probability, of its maintaining its independence and asserting a government for itself? I find here in this book, Manning's Law of Nations, the following note taken from Wheaton's Elements of International Law, a book which, though merely the opinion of one man, is yet an enlightened opinion and carries its weight with it: without any marked change in the relative advantages of the contending forces. The insurrection continues, but Spain has gained no superiority. Six years of strife give the insurrection a significance which can not be denied. Its duration and the tenacity of its advance, together with the absence of the manifested power of repression on the part of Spain, can not be controverted, and may make some positive steps on the part of other powers a matter of self-necessity.

The deplorable strife in Cuba continues—

This was in 1878—

Here is an opinion after eight years of prolonged war, of prolonged efforts to suppress this insurrectionary insurgent power in the Island of Cuba. It is the opinion of a publicist, the opinion of one of the text-books upon the subject of international law which is so much cited here, if there be such a thing, which there really is not, it being nothing more than the consent of publicists and the action of nations from time to time in reference to it.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] spoke of intervention as a hostile act. Among the subjects which are mentioned as creating a proper occasion for interference by a government, following this note, this writer, Manning, in a late book of authority on these subjects, says:

The concession of such rights may, at a certain epoch in the strife, be claimed both in the interests of humanity and of neutral states; there always, indeed, arrives a moment at which such a concession is made (as in the case of the late Southern insurrection in the United States) by the government from which the revolt takes place. The main difficulty is found in ascertaining the moment proper for what is called "recognition of belligerency." It must be neither so premature as to embarrass a friendly government in suppressing what may prove to be only a transient and partial display of disorder or treachery, or so dilatory as to protract the inconvenience and cruelty incident to a war conducted on a large scale apart from all the humane alleviations which the laws of war have introduced. The quality of the test for determining the moment at which interference for belligerent purposes only can be justified became a subject of earnest controversy during and after the late American civil war.

Mr. Dana, in a note to his edition of Wheaton's Elements, says:

To decide whether the recognition was uncalled for and premature requires something more than a consideration of approximate facts and the overt and formal acts of the contending parties. The foreign state is bound and entitled to consider the preceding history of the parties; the magnitude and completeness of the political and military organization and preparations on each side; the probable extent of the conflict by sea and land; the probable extent and rapidity of its development; and, above all, the probability that its own merchant vessels, naval officers, and consuls may be precipitated into sudden and difficult complications abroad. The best that can be said is that the foreign state may protect itself by a seasonable decision, either upon a test case that arises or by a general prospective decision; while, on the other hand, if it makes the recognition prematurely it is liable to the suspicion of an unfriendly purpose to the parent state. The recognition of belligerent rights is not solely to the advantage of the insurgents. They gain the great advantage of a recognized status, and the opportunity to employ commissioned cruisers at sea, and to exert all the powers known to maritime warfare, with the sanction of foreign nations. They can obtain abroad loans, military and naval materials, and enlist men, as against everything but neutrality laws; their flag and commissions are acknowledged, their revenue laws are respected, and they acquire a quasi political recognition.

These are the grounds upon which, according to those writers, the laws of nations allow and justify a recognition.

Generally speaking—

Says Mr. Dana, in his edition of Wheaton, part 4, page 187, of Mr. Manning's book—the occupying power is established as soon as the population is disarmed, or even where the country is traversed by flying columns. It being impossible to occupy bodily each and every point of a province, the expression "territory" must, as regards occupation, be interpreted liberally. A territory is considered as occupied when it is actually placed under the authority of the hostile army. The occupation only extends to those territories where this authority is established and can be exercised.

We see, therefore, by these authorities that occupation of a country is when force is asserted, force either in the absence of adequate attempts to suppress it by the nation of established authority, or by the superior force of an insurgent and rebellious power.

Look at Cuba! What is the condition? What was the condition for ten years up to 1879? The records of the State Department which I have here before me establish it. I shall not take the time to read copiously from them, but will publish them in my remarks.

They assert that at every point except in the fortified towns and seacoast cities the Government of Cuba maintained its power during that entire period of time. That is the assertion of our own consular authorities. But what was the condition? What is the condition now? Let us see for a moment what justification have we, what demand have we to interfere, to intervene. I wish the resolutions were more positive than they are. I wish the resolution of the House of Representatives with respect to intervention was in the form of a joint resolution and imperative. Why? Because it is for the interest not only of the United States, but of Spain, that the contest should be terminated by the establishment of a free government, because nothing but disaster to that ancient Government, to her internal civilization, can occur by the protraction of this struggle. If Mr. Seward is right, if Mr. Adams is right, if Mr. Cushing is right, if every Administration of this Government has been right from the days of Mr. Monroe to the present time, that the dominion of despotic and arbitrary authority instead of republican government in the Island of Cuba and upon the Western Hemisphere is doomed to extinction, then there can be no doubt that this Government should adopt the manly and courageous policy and say so, friendlily but firmly, to the Government of Spain.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Florida allow me?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose we do take the action in Congress that the Senator desires, which I understand is that we should intervene, and Spain refuses to grant an independent government to Cuba; what would he have us do then?

I quite agree with the Senator from Florida that if the time has come when this Government for any reason ought to promote the establishment of an independent government in Cuba, if the Government ought to exert its power and influence to that end, we ought to do it in a straightforward, manly fashion; and I understand that means that if we intervene to the extent of saying to Spain that this Government has come to the conclusion that Cuba ought to be free and independent and Spain refuses, then we should aid Cuba and go to war to carry out that end. Now, I wish to know what the Senator thinks we should do.

Mr. CALL. I will state what I think. The first action would be to say what Mr. Seward said to France, and then see what effect it has. The next step would be to repeal or modify our neutrality laws and allow the friends of freedom and free institutions in the United States who see fit to risk their lives, as they have done in every contest since the Republics of North and South and Central America have acquired freedom—the brave American men who wish to risk their lives in the defense of liberty and humanity to have an opportunity to do so. That will settle the question without any war, and settle it immediately—within ninety days. That is what I would do.

Such an act is not in hostility to Spain, because it is an inevitable fact that if the war continues Spain will be bankrupted, her people oppressed with an enormous debt, and Cuba never will be subdued by her power. That island is 3,000 miles from Spain, and with a hundred million people in this country who, despite imperialistic tendencies and the autocratic disposition of our public policies, are devoted to freedom, the maintenance of despotic institutions in that country is impossible.

These are considerations of public policy, a public policy which has been affirmed first in our Declaration of Independence, in which we invited that people to adopt the same course which we adopted, namely, the discontinuance of monarchical, despotic authority, although the nation whose control over us we objected to and from whose people we descended originated all our ideas of freedom and the principles of civil liberty which are contained within our Government, our Constitution, and the customs of our country, although its government of its colonial possessions in the main has been liberal. Some of her colonies are now in advance of the American Republic and the American people in all the public policies that look toward the advancement and the comfort and the welfare of the masses of the people. Take the Island of New Zealand, and we do not compare with those English people in the laws and policies and institutions which bring comfort to every man's home and education to every child. This was the people against whom we revolted because of autocracy and despotism in their government. The power of the European nations everywhere on this Continent has been abolished except in Canada, where it has been maintained by the wisest public policy, where the powers of government are exercised in the interest and by the consent of the people of Canada. Shall we suppose that when on this Continent the power of autocracy and European despotism and European institutions has been destroyed by the people themselves it is possible as to the little Island of Cuba, right here upon our shores, for any force, much less that of Spain, to maintain a continued possession of the island?

Now, these are considerations of public policy founded, as I said, upon our own Declaration of Independence, founded again upon the declarations of every Administration that has ever controlled this Government, founded upon the express declarations, as I have read, of Mr. Seward to France when, after having acquired complete possession of Mexico, having obtained the formal assent of her people and her different forms of authority, having established complete power there and a government of their own, we recognized the insurgent government of Juarez because it was a republican government, when it was fugitive from its capital and had neither place nor standing except in the affections of the people. At that time Mr. Seward addressed to the minister from France the observations which I have read and which will be found in the record of the Department of State.

I say, then, here is first the question of public policy, to which we are committed; that we should say to Spain that we feel compelled to accord not only belligerent rights, as the resolution does in a mere expression of opinion, but that in the opinion of Congress free government should be allowed to the people of Cuba, and that if necessary to prevent the further molestation of American citizens the Congress of the United States suggests the possibility of a necessity of intervention on its part.

Mr. President, it is said that this is a mere expression of opinion; that it has not the force of law. But a mere declaration of opinion on the part of this body, reflecting the public sentiment of the people of the United States, is a potential fact, reflecting as it does the settled and public opinion, reflecting the deliberate judgment of the intelligent, thinking people of the United States. That is a power which conveys its warnings to all nations and to all people, not in a spirit of bravado, not that we can assert that which is wrong and untrue, but when we are right, when we are justified by sound and wise public policy in the interest of humanity, when we are justified by a sound public policy in the interest of the inevitable future, every manly and just consideration concurs to give force and effect to a declaration of the opinion of the people of the United States as to any measure of public policy which is definite and settled.

Mr. President, what is the condition now which demands action on the part of our people, which demands action by this body? The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] alludes to instances of outrage and condemns their being related here—here in this body, charged with the duty of protecting the American citizen anywhere; this body, charged with the duty, higher than the President himself, of controlling his action in regard to treaties; this body which, with the representatives of the people, is charged alone with the responsibility of war or peace.

What is the duty? That which gives prestige to the great Government of the British Empire, that for which all people honor it, that which makes us all proud of our lineage and descent is that the subjects of Great Britain everywhere feel that her power is around and about them, and all nations recognize the fact.

I am going to submit a letter to the Senate. I state that it is as good evidence as can be produced of a fact. I know the writer of the letter, though his name is concealed and will not be given. I know him to be, so far as any judgment can go from an acquaintance of some years, a truthful man. He writes from the midst of these things.

Mr. HALE. Of whom is the Senator speaking? I did not get the name.

Mr. CALL. His name I do not wish to give. I say I know him.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator mentioned the name of this writer.

Mr. CALL. No, I did not mention his name. I give my testimony that he is a good man, a truthful man, an honest man. I believe his statement from my knowledge of him. If you were in court you would say from your knowledge of the witness that you would believe him upon his oath, and if three respectable witnesses shall testify it becomes competent evidence. The reports of our consuls become competent evidence. When a member of this body certifies to a knowledge of a person and to his truthfulness and worthiness of credit, it becomes reasonable evidence of the facts stated. I ask the Secretary to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEBRUARY 25, 1896.

Senator WILKINSON CALL.

HONORED AND DEAR SIR: One of those bloody deeds which raises the heart in horror and indignation has occurred just at the very gates of this city on last Saturday at the little town of Guatao. The Spanish have procured means to conceal it, but numerous testimonies from persons coming from the place are spreading the frightful news.

Here are the facts: On Saturday, February 22, a rebel force encountered a Spanish column composed of 100 men and 3 cannons, which were preceded by 50 cavalrymen of the Pizarro Regiment, commanded by Sergeant Margatton, at the town of Punta Brava, some 15 miles east from Habana. The insurgents were 100 men, who charged against the Spaniards and retired after some time of fighting. The Spanish, under command of a Colonel Cervera, a libelist writer of the Government, and Captain Calvo of the cavalrymen ran after the rebels in the direction of the town of Guatao. When they reached the place they found no insurgents there, as these had proceeded on another way; but the Spanish cavalry was blind with rage, and under pretense of intelligence with the insurgents they began a horrible slaughter among the pacific Cubans inhabiting the place. Twenty men have been killed and 17 made prisoner and brought to the city of Marianao, 5 miles from Habana. Among the prisoners I have heard there is an American citizen who is wounded. The soldiers rose into the houses and pulled out the innocent dwellers to be sacrificed at the streets. Some were ordered to run, and when they did it they were shot in the back. It is reported among the dead a man 80 years old and another 75, who were unable to walk. A poor milk seller, who was cleansing the bottles for his trade, fell down by six bullets. At the houses where the soldiers found no men, but only women, they cried that some of those must be men under female disguise for escaping capture, and the women were submitted to recognition by them raising up their clothes and showing their sex. Some members of the Red Cross in the place, who had gathered a wounded man, were threatened and deprived of him. The Spanish spent the night there, and during its dark hours some women have been violated.

God and humanity must know this carnal feast.

Some days ago a man in one street of Habana was charged by one Spanish soldier as insurgent, and amid a delirium of blood the man was sacrificed by 67 bayonet wounds and 6 machete blows. The Spanish papers assured he was crazy, but all the Cubans in the city know that was only a common token of the ferocity and bloodthirst of his race. I have felt at my heart the need to make you know these facts.

P. S.—To-day two American citizens, reporters for your papers, have been arrested for asking news about this crime in the city of Guatao.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, that is a very shocking narration. The question is, Is it true? It is like these newspaper reports. No doubt the Marquis de Lôme, who represents the Spanish Government here, is not responsible for that. There is no doubt that the Spanish officials condemn that, but the question is, Is that the customary condition of things prevailing there? Has that Government power to protect the citizens of the United States? That is the question for us. I do not condemn the Spanish minister for going into the papers here. It seems to me that it was right that he should do so, that there is no objection to appealing to the public opinion of the people of the United States when it is not done in an incendiary manner. But I say, if that is the condition of things under Spanish rule in the Island of Cuba, it is the imperative duty of this body, charged with the high responsibility of controlling the foreign relations of this Government, to say that the American flag shall protect with the power of its people its citizens and its interests in every land, and especially in Cuba, because here in this correspondence I assert that Cuba, lying upon our shores, with immediate and constant intercourse between our people and hers, is the proper and the necessary subject of solicitude and of more than usual consideration in regard to our public connections and policies toward her.

Now, let me see if that is true. Are the probabilities, are the corroborating evidences enough to satisfy anyone of the truth of the statements in that letter? Let me read a letter from Santiago de Cuba, written June 17, 1869. What happened then characteristically, when asserted by credible witnesses, now derives corroboration from the condition of things then and the characteristics of that struggle and those people. What better evidence do you want than corroborative testimony? This is in the state papers of the United States. It comes through the acting United States consul at Santiago de Cuba, A. S. Phillips:

SANTIAGO DE CUBA, June 17, 1869.

MY DEAR WIFE AND CHILD: These are the last lines you will ever receive from me. In four hours I am to be shot, having been captured by the Spaniards on the Island of Cuba, where the vessel ran, instead of going to Falmouth, Jamaica, where I shipped to go. Now, Maggie, I have no money to leave you, and I am so sorry, darling, as I leave you penniless; but you may get some by getting a good lawyer to sue the owners of the vessel for damages. They have taken my life and deprived you of my support, and ought to support you.

There will be a statement sent to the Government that he can see; there is also, I have been told, a contract in New York to land these men in Cuba, and if he can get hold of it you can get big damages from them. The vessel's name was the Grape Shot, schooner, of New York; the owner's names are Henry Wall, a surveyor of New York; one Highdecker, a broker in the same place; one Slowmaker, a liquor dealer. All this can be found out in the New York custom-house. You can get a good deal of money if you get the right kind of a man to take hold of it, and enough to keep you for life. The time is getting short, darling, and if I could only see you and baby once more I could die happy. I have always loved you, darling, whatever you may think to the contrary; God knows it is true. For you, and only you, I have tried to get along and make you a good living. You have always been a good and true wife to me, and, darling, do forgive all the trouble I have ever given you, and meet me in heaven. Tell Smith that he must let you have some money to help you along; tell him as a dying brother I entreat him to take care of you and my little boy. I have one kind friend here, a Mr. O'Callaghan. Darling, I can not write more, my hand is sore. Tell Cousin Fannie and Aunt Olden. May God Almighty bless you and keep you and baby is my last and only prayer.

Tell baby his father's last prayer to him is that he never drinks one drop and be good to his mother.

After I am dead Mr. O'Callaghan will cut a lock of my hair, and my handkerchief, and send it to you.

Good by, darling. I command you to sue the owners. Call a witness, one William Craig, of Oliver street, New York, who was on the vessel with me.

God bless you.

Your affectionate and dying husband,

CHAS. SPEAKMAN.

Mrs. MAGGIE C. SPEAKMAN,
Care of Capt. J. W. Weaver, Aurora, Ind., U. S.

This man, against the protest of the American representative, was shot to death, with his declared statement that he was ignorant of the destination of the vessel, with the declaration of our minister that the vessel had the right under the treaty to enter with her contraband goods subject alone to capture, and with no right of imprisonment or of punishment, this American citizen appealing to his Government was shot to death. Here follows a long correspondence. If he had been an Englishman the guns of the English fleet would have thundered around Morro Castle in thirty days. Englishmen would have been proud that their Government did not hesitate to incur whatever risks of war there might be instead of an ignominious peace.

But, Mr. President, that was not all. Here is Wyeth, a young man who ships for his health to the West Indies, protesting in the power and in the name of the American Government and its ministers that he had not engaged in any unlawful expedition, that he was not even informed of the destination of the vessel, that he was only a passenger. He was shot to death because they had caught the vessel entering into the Cuban waters and without any evidence of complicity with the insurgents. Here is a long correspondence in which a demand for indemnity was made, as Mr. Cushing says, and after a long time it was accorded. But what is indemnity in comparison with the life of an American citizen?

Mr. President, that is not all. Take the case of the Virginius. Fifty-three American citizens were put to death in violation of the provisions of the treaty, acknowledged afterwards in all the diplomatic correspondence. Here is a long series of letters from Mr. Cushing condemning the "savage and unlawful and horrible act," to use his expression. General Burriel, the officer who committed this massacre, was promoted because of his murder of American citizens, as Mr. Cushing calls it, one year after the occurrence. Here is the correspondence in the State Department, in which they demand an explanation, and having promised and having made reparation in money for the 53 American citizens, instead of subjecting this man to the processes of the law (Mr. Cushing says if he be innocent because he obeyed orders, let him submit to the tribunals and offer his defense), he was promoted—instead of being punished for the act of eternal infamy.

Mr. President, do Senators talk about evidence and about newspaper statements? Do they talk about a band of insurgents? Here is the constitution that those people have established. But that is not all. Here is a long list of perhaps a hundred American citizens murdered, put to death, not taken with arms in their hands. Here is a case of particular atrocity of a German and an American pursued in the streets of Habana and the case of the poor man Speakman that I spoke of. Here is a case where a man demanded to be put off the vessel in a friendly port. They refused him, and when they arrived in the port of Cuba the officer of the vessel, having discharged his cargo, forced him to leave because of a personal difficulty. He was arrested and shot to death because he was an American, on the presumption that being there he had engaged in some act of violence. It was enough that he was an American for him to be murdered.

But here is another case, a case which occurred in the streets of Habana, testified to by the British consul-general, in which an American and a foreigner walking along side by side were accosted. The American had on a blue necktie, and the English consul writing here says that he was riding in his carriage, he saw a man chased by another one, his neck clothing torn from him, and a pistol shot fired; that he opened the door of his carriage to take him in, but before he reached the spot the Catalonian volunteers seized him and stabbed him to death in his presence, and he died because he had what they took to be the color of the American citizen, a blue necktie. That is the testimony of the English consul-general.

But the remarkable part of it is that in one of these cases there was a British subject molested, and immediately the Government of Great Britain sent a ship of war to the waters of Cuba for the protection of its citizens, and the consul notes the difference.

Mr. President, here is justification for war, but I am not the advocate of war. No war is necessary and no war is possible. We do not want Cuba; we only want her people, when they have a right to it, to have self-government. We do not want to fight the battles of Spain, as our silence does with our neutrality laws. We want to give to the Cuban people the rights of war. We want to assert against the power of Spain and every other power the rights of humanity in the prosecution of the war. We want to say that the rules of regulated and civilized warfare shall be observed when prisoners are taken; that they shall be treated with humanity, and only confined until exchanged or released by treaty. That is all that we ask. Why this objection to it? Do Senators say there will be war? War with that country? What commerce have we for Spain to prey upon? Our commerce is carried in foreign bottoms, and privateers could do us no harm. But there is no possibility of war. It would shake the dynasty of Spain to the ground in a moment. We simply demand the rights of humanity and justice to an organized revolution. We declare that there is a state of public war and accord to them the rights of belligerency, and demand humanity in the treatment of prisoners. Why not?

In the face of all this demonstration of opinion and all this testimony, are we to remain perfectly silent? Is that the part of public policy and of humanity?

Mr. President, the question is, What is this struggle in Cuba for? Whether it is just or unjust, whether wise or unwise, whether it be a patriotic or an unpatriotic war on their part, if there be a state of war, if there be a state of public hostility, if there be a probability of success and the establishment of a government of their own, it is our duty to recognize it; it is our duty to see that they have the same rights that any other people waging war would have.

Now, what is their condition? Does any one doubt in the face of the fact here that there is a state of public war in Cuba? The decision of the Supreme Court has been alluded to here, where the Supreme Court decided that the fact was that the President of the United States having declared certain facts to exist, it thereby resulted as a necessary implication that there was a state of war and that belligerent rights existed. Is not that merely a declaration, whatever weight is to be attached to the opinion of the Supreme Court, which, in my opinion, is only that which is given to the opinion of any other wise and sensible people?—because they have no power beyond the decision of the case which is before them. I repudiate the idea utterly that they have any autocratic power. To-day they may decide one way, and to-morrow in a similar case they may decide a different way. Congress is the supreme legislative power over the Supreme Court and every other department of the Government to declare the law and to make the law. But, according to that opinion, whatever weight you choose to give it, is it not clear that when a state of facts exists which show there is belligerency, then those facts themselves demand its recognition? What is the state of facts in Cuba? Here was a ten-years war. Here was a war prosecuted in the face of these constant shootings and murders. Hear what our consul, Mr. Phillips, says:

> The merciless and barbarous way in which this war is carried on by Spain shocks every principle of humanity and civilization and demands an interference.

There was, then, a state of war, so officially declared by our representative as a fact.

That was ten years ago. That was the war in which shortly afterwards the seven students were shot. Here is the correspondence with the United States and its minister deprecating the killing of the seven Cuban students in Habana and congratulating Spain that she had at last, using the words of Mr. Cushing, "begun to awake to the barbarity, the infamous barbarity," of that act by the pardon and the release of the remaining students who had been held. For what were they murdered? Simply for the demolition or injury or mutilation of a tomb or a statue or an inscription, or something of that kind. They were boys, shot to death, and this young Speakman was only 20 years of age. Here the consul tells of his remonstrance.

Here is a very singular thing. Here is Captain-General Dolce in the war of ten years doing what? Refusing to surrender some prisoners to be shot to death and murdered, and he was compelled to resign his office by the Catalonian volunteers and abandon the island. The captain-general under the authority of Spain was himself compelled to submit resignation because he had dissatisfied these volunteers by his acts of clemency.

Now, what shall we do in such a state of things? Here is the record in the communications of our own consular officers and our own ministers. Why deny, what motive for denying, that the Government of Spain is unable to maintain its authority even over its own forces in the Island of Cuba, and that the sentiment of the Spanish authorities prompts to acts of atrocious cruelty toward the American people and toward all others, and especially to all persons of Cuban extraction in any way connected with that authority, and is such that the Government can not restrain it?

What is the condition at present? There is an evidence of what the present revolution is. For ten years the Cuban people resisted the whole power of the Spanish Government, and according to their statements, 150,000 men left their bones in that island, and only when guaranties were given of self-government, complete and entire, did those people lay down their arms.

Here is further evidence. Can we not see something from the light given by that to furnish good evidence of what the present revolution is? It does not follow necessarily because that was maintained for ten years that the present one will be maintained for that length of time, but it renders it probable, it renders it possible.

Now, what other facts come in? Here for twelve months a state of war has existed. Here is our consular report from Mr. Hyatt, stating that the island is full of these insurgents, and if they had arms the whole population would join them. Is there no evidence in that statement? Here is an army of 45,000 persons. Here is Gomez traveling from one end of the country to the other; and no general of modern times has exhibited greater ability than this man, organizing a force without the recognition of any nation, organizing a force supplied with arms entirely from the private enterprise of the Cuban people, and maintaining the possession of four-fifths of that island, constantly going backward and forward, crossing a wall of men, as General Weyler testifies, as he moves from one section or division of the island to another, and reaching the immediate precincts of Habana.

Spain has sent 150,000 men, according to her report; but some Cubans deny this, and assert that neither in the last war nor in the present war was there or is there such a force of Spaniards in the island. The Spanish army is on paper. Spain has not the means to send the forces which she pretends to have sent there. That is the opinion of Cubans. An intelligent Cuban was talking to me yesterday on that subject. But, however this may be, I do not wish to say severe things about the Government of Spain. I wish to deal with facts. That country has had an ancient record of honor and distinction for three centuries. She maintained a heroic war with the Moors and drove them out of Europe. There are very distinguished traits of character in the Spanish people; but it is idle to talk about their maintaining their attitude toward Cuba against the inevitable march of civilization.

Events for more than two hundred years have marked the disappearance of Spanish power from this hemisphere. Why? Because the facts which occurred in the war from 1868 to 1878-79 in Cuba have created everywhere among the people where they have been attempted a profound sentiment of detestation and hatred. It is because Spain has not pursued the benevolent policies which have characterized England and other colonizing countries, and which have not characterized the Spanish Government. What man would there be with the soul of a man who would not, if living in Cuba, resent the shooting of those seven students because they were supposed in some patriotic impulse to have mutilated the tomb of a Spaniard? It is strange to me that here in our Senate, here among the American people, where bravery and courage and sympathy with right and humanity are the great principles of public and private life, where we disgrace the coward and scorn a man who has no sympathy with mankind, such facts should not move us to immediate and stern action.

Is there any doubt about these records here for ten years? Your own archives confirm the stories of present atrocities and of present wrongs. How idle it is for Spain to talk here, with this growing people of 100,000,000 upon her borders, wedded to the sentiments of freedom of government. Here is even her own minister, as reported by General Sickles in his dispatches, saying "When we are satisfied that the people of Cuba are in favor of free government, we shall accord it to them," acknowledging the inevitable course and yet denying that free government to Cuba.

I ask why shall Spain burden her people with an enormous debt?

As well might she attempt to restrain the eruptions of Vesuvius; as well attempt to dam the mountain torrents; as well attempt to stop the tides of the ocean, as to prevent the progress of free opinion, the progress of free institutions, the instinct of the mass of mankind that they have a right to live, that they have a right to comfort, that they have a right to the education of their children, that they have a right to the privileges which belong fairly to every man, however high and potent he may be. You can not stop that great mass and weight of opinion. So we stand to-day.

We are told that the President alone has this power. This imperialism, this tendency in our country to autocratic and aristocratic institutions, this interpretation by a life power in our Constitution to the effect that some one somewhere has power superior to that of the people in their aggregate and collective capacity, power superior to their representatives in this body and the other where the supreme representative power of the people is vested, should be checked.

Senators do not appreciate the duty we owe to the American people. We do not recognize the fact that by our Constitution the power of 70,000,000 people is vested in this body as the lever and the restraining power in connection with the other House, this power being permanent, cautious, and deliberate; we do not recognize the fact that in this vast power of 70,000,000 people there is nothing superior or equal to this body; that the legislative power is paramount and sovereign. What possible reason can be given for the idea that the President of the United States alone can do what the House of Representatives, representing the people, and the Senate, representing the people and the States, can not do? Suppose the President receives an ambassador, what can he do? He has the power to do that without a treaty and admit him to the White House and talk to him. What more without the consent of this body? How idle then to talk in that way! What can the President, under the express language and meaning of the Constitution, do without the advice and consent of the Senate? He can propose treaties. What good will that do? He can admit an ambassador, receive his card at the White House, and nothing more. When a treaty with his Government shall be made it must be with the advice and consent of the Senate. Suppose the President issues a proclamation of war, and the Senate and House of Representatives say no, what will it avail? Where would he be if he persisted in defying the power of the Senate and House of Representatives? He would soon cease to be President by the act of the House and the final judgment of this body.

We accord to the President of the United States and to his execution of the will of Congress all respect; but how unwarranted the idea, upon what ground does it rest, that the President of the United States, without the people, without Congress, in defiance of their will, may do anything. That is not so. That is not this scheme of government. This scheme of government is that the two Houses of Congress are the supreme legislative power, supreme over everybody and over everything. To their will, expressed in proper form, all dignitaries and all officials must bow.

The President of the United States is not greater than the collective nation. We are not greater than the collective people; we simply represent them. And what else? If we protect American citizens in Cuba; if we recognize the actual existing government there; if we assert that the rights of humanity belong to an insurgent people there, whether they be citizens of the United States or not, and that when captured as prisoners of war they shall have the protection of the laws of war; if we say to Spain or to anybody else, or to Turkey in Armenia, "If you persist in murdering and outraging a whole people, we will intervene with force and power," will we not be justified? That is what General Grant as President said. That is what he says in this correspondence; that is what his minister said, that unless these brutal outrages are stopped, unless other and milder methods are adopted, the United States may be compelled to intervene for the protection of her citizens, and also in the interests of an outraged humanity.

Why, then, this great hesitation about intervention? General Grant said that ten years ago; he said it with the authority of Congress. In response to an inquiry of Congress he communicated the declaration, and yet the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] read a part of General Grant's message as if it were in condemnation of this resolution and this proposed action. So far from being an authority or precedent against this resolution, it is directly in its favor. The condition in which he declared such action must be taken has occurred and is now occurring.

Those brutal outrages have not been stopped; they have continued. Here are many cases of arrests of American citizens. Here is the case of Rodriguez, an American citizen, reported by the American consul, arrested upon suspicion and actually murdered by a harsh and severe confinement, an old man 70 years of age, the record of which is to be found in the report of your own American consul.

Whence does it come? Why multiply proofs and reports when case after case is mentioned of arrests of American citizens? Take the case of General Sanguilly, of which I have no evidence except general statements. We have demanded a record of his trial, and we understand it has been refused. He was an American citizen sentenced for life to the accursed prison of Ceuta, which, with all others like it, ought to be wiped off the face of the earth by the action of all civilized peoples. He was subjected to arrest and imprisonment for months and sentenced for life, without a fair trial, upon suspicion alone, with no inquiry except an informal trial. Upon your own consular authority, case after case is stated where such outrages have been perpetrated.

The Senator from Louisiana talks about the want of evidence of these outrages and comments unfavorably on the Cuban people and the Senator from Ohio, defending the Cubans, read a letter from some person in Boston, which stated that these people had been kept in ignorance, that they were all mixed—mulattoes, negroes, all sorts of people. That is not true. I am very familiar with some of these people. I personally know many of them. There are some of the brightest and the most accomplished people among them to be found anywhere, versed in the different languages, with the peculiar sprightliness of the Latin intermixed with the Spanish, a people charming in social intercourse, elegant in their habits; many of them are accustomed to large wealth, and yet you do not find in any country in the world a people abandoning their fortunes and their homes and sacrificing their lives as these people have done.

They are martyrs to liberty and have a right to honor and respect from all men who honor heroism and the sacrifice of personal ease and enjoyment for principle and right and for the love of their country; they are of the martyrs whose "blood is the seed of the church." Poland is perhaps the only other instance equaling them. It is true that the Cuban generals lead a great number of people who have had no opportunity for education; but it is also true that they lead a mass of people who are penetrated with the idea of terrible oppression.

Read the accounts of shooting men down, and contrast the conduct of Gomez with reference to his prisoners with the conduct of the Spanish commanders, Gomez discharging them with the privilege of joining his forces or going back to the Spaniards, or releasing them on parole; while it has been common with the Spanish commanders to have prisoners shot down, the excuse being made that they were shot while attempting to escape.

I shall read at this point an account of a case of that kind, which is furnished by United States Consul Hall:

SANTIAGO DE CUBA, August 15, 1869.

I write you to advise of the horrible news that has spread through the town since the return of the Villaclara, which will take this letter.

The facts are that on account of the departure of the prisoners Espin and Perez, physicians, Salvador Benitez, jr., Ascencio, the two Collaros, one of the Villasana, besides some intimate friends and relatives and a son of one of the Benitez, called Lico, by the same steamer for Bayamo, where, it was said, the prisoners were to be confronted with an individual who accused them of being in correspondence with the insurgents, no guilt having been discovered in the proceedings previously instituted in this city, a large number of persons went to the wharf to meet the steamer, it having also been rumored that she would bring back the prisoners. I leave you to imagine their horror when they witnessed the landing of the escort and its commander and heard the report of the latter, that the prisoners had been shot between Jiguani and an encampment called Lorma de Piedra, by order of a colonel called Palacios, of the regiment of Antequera, without authority of any source whatsoever. He also had shot, according to report, the persons who accompanied the prisoners; they were Sinforiano Alvarez, Manuel Fresnada, Lico Benitez, a mulatto servant of Perez, and even the horses that they rode.

Here is a consular report. What do Senators think of that? That is not an isolated instance? Here are hundreds of them contained within the pages of this book which is a State paper of the United States. It would not be just to accuse Spain and all the Spanish authorities of these things, but it is just to say that it is the established condition of things there then and now, and that the power is wanting to suppress these hostilities, these cruelties. The decree of Valmaceda to shoot down all persons under 15 years of age who should be found without a permit away from their homes has had its effect. It has been modified, it is true, but why? It has been modified because of this proceeding here, because the sentiment of our people will not permit it.

If these facts are not true as to the treatment of people there, why is not their falsity demonstrated? Why is it not reported by our diplomatic representatives? No, Mr. President, the records of our Government conclusively prove that the facts are as we have stated, that the traditional policy of this Government in respect to Cuba has been described, and that Spain has been notified that the Cuban people have maintained this war for ten years, from 1868 to 1878; that they established a form of government. Here it is. Here is their constitution [exhibiting], similar to our own, though not full in its details, as, indeed, could not be expected under the circumstances in which it was formed.

They have again revolted. For twelve months they have maintained their war successfully; they have not been suppressed, and the same cruelties and the same arbitrary authority which attended the war from 1868 to 1878 have characterized this war. The Spanish authorities are meeting with no success; Gomez and Maceo traverse the island from one end to the other continuously.

Notwithstanding the cruelties and severities and the attempted suppression of this insurrection, it still increases in force, in vigor, and the sympathies of the people of the United States and their active assistance it seems impossible to prevent. Every day there are enlistments and attempts to cross the Gulf of Mexico to the Island of Cuba for the purpose of taking part in this war. The American people are determined that there shall be no acts of cruelty or inhumanity perpetrated upon the people of Cuba in close proximity to the people of the United States. I venture to say that if in Mexico that condition of things was to occur, this people would awaken not only to remonstrance but to active interference, and I say so because here in this report of the Secretary of State to the Congress of the United States it appears that the Mexican minister, Mr. Romero, of whom I have spoken in terms of compliment, which he deserves, communicated to this country constantly the cruelties which had been perpetrated upon the people of Mexico, and these formed the subject of remonstrance even to the powerful Government of France at a time when the United States was comparatively disabled by the exercise of all her energies in the civil war between the States.

We have upon all these grounds an established traditional declaration of the public policy of the United States in reference to the Island of Cuba, and it would be unmanly and disgraceful for us to go back upon this public policy, established and declared and proclaimed to Spain a hundred times in the pages of the official reports on the table before me.

Talk about there being no war in Cuba, when for twelve months following these ten years 40,000 men, some with arms and some without arms, pass backward and forward through the Spanish lines as if there were no lines there, coming within a few miles of Habana, and disappearing again.

Mr. President, what is the duty of the United States, considering Spain alone and her interests, considering the happiness of her people alone? Is it to permit her resources to be exhausted, to permit her people to be conscripted, her young men and boys to be carried to that island to be destroyed by the uncongenial conditions of climate? Is it to our interest to permit a great public debt to be accumulated upon her? Is it to our interest that we should violate our traditional public policy? Is it to our interest that we shall withhold our expressions not only of sympathy but of encouragement to a people struggling to assert for themselves the power of self-government, and who have for so many years made such great sacrifices in order to obtain it? Can we not do this without committing any act of hostility?

It seems to me that there is no ground of public policy, that there is no ground of reasonable public policy, of good sense, upon which we can fail to assert what our people have asserted time and again, that it will be the duty of the United States, if this war continues, if it is not brought to a close by Spain, to take such action ourselves as will bring it to a close. It is our duty to say to the people of the Island of Cuba who are struggling for freedom that we not only sympathize with them, but we declare our belief that they have a right to their freedom, that they have a right to self-government, that they shall have all the assistance which fair and just neutrality accords, and if continuing that struggle interrupts the commerce of the country, preventing its development, interfering with our trade and our interests—continuing this inhuman destruction of human life and property—if that shall continue to occur, we declare to them and to the world that we consider it the imperative duty of the people of the United States to interfere.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I do not like to weary the Senate this afternoon by making any remarks upon the pending question.

Mr. CULLOM. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. It is now after 4 o'clock, and I think it is hardly fair that the Senator should be expected to go on at this hour. With his permission, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. That will be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press that motion. I have a little bill in my charge which I should like to have disposed of.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to yielding to the transaction of other business.

NEW ORLEANS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of Senate bill 2132.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company. It authorizes the New Orleans Pacific Railroad to relinquish any lands within the indemnity limits of its grant, which by decision of the Land Department of the Government has been awarded it, in favor of any settler entitled to the right of entry under the laws of the United States who has been allowed to make entry thereof, or who has resided upon and improved the same for five years, and to select in lieu thereof an equal quantity of other lands, from any of the public lands not mineral, and within the limits of its grant and not otherwise appropriated at the date of selection, to which it shall receive title the same as though originally granted.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire if that bill has come from any committee?

Mr. PASCO. The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands unanimously, and has had careful consideration by that committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. As the Senator from Florida has stated, the bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands; and, furthermore, I will state to the Senator from Illinois that it is recommended by the Interior Department. It is a small affair, and there are about a hundred honest farmers who will be affected by it.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not make any objection to the bill. I only wanted to know what the fact was.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Was there not an amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. BLANCHARD. There was an amendment striking out the preamble.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question on striking out the preamble will be taken after action upon the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands to strike out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

THOMAS F. LEAHY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2187) to pension Thomas F. Leahy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the fourth and fifth lines the bill reads, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the Pension Office." It should be "pension laws." I move to amend the bill in that particular.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, after the word "Pension," it is proposed to strike out "Office" and insert "laws"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas F. Leahy, late an unassigned conscript of Vermont Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MISSOURI CONFEDERATE HOME.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to consider the bill (S. 2482) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to loan two condemned cannon to the Confederate Home of Missouri, located at Higginsville, Lafayette County, Mo.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN UTAH.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2037) to provide times and places for holding terms of United States courts in Utah.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment, was in section 3, line 6, after the word "reside," to insert "or where the cause of action arose"; and in line 11, before the words "of said divisions," to strike out "all" and insert "both"; so as to read:

That all civil suits not of a local character which shall be brought in the district or circuit courts of the United States for the district of Utah, in either of said divisions, against a single defendant, or where all the defendants reside in the same division of said district, shall be brought in the division in which the defendant or defendants reside, or where the cause of action arose, or if there are two or more defendants residing in different divisions, such suit may be brought in either division: and all mesne and final process subject to the provisions of this act issued in either of said divisions may be served and executed in either or both of said divisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, in line 15, after the word "reside," to insert "or where the cause of action arose"; so as to read:

All issues of fact in civil causes triable in any of the said courts shall be tried in the division where the defendant, or one of the defendants, reside, or where the cause of action arose, unless by consent of both parties the case shall be removed to some other division.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PIPE LINES OVER PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2032) to grant right of way over the public domain for pipe lines.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 4, after the words "United States," to insert "situate in the State of Wyoming outside of the boundary lines of the Yellowstone National Park"; so as to read:

That the right of way through the public lands and reservations of the United States situate in the State of Wyoming outside of the boundary lines of the Yellowstone National Park is hereby granted to any pipe-line company or corporation formed for the purpose of transporting oils, crude or refined, etc.

Mr. CLARK. With the concurrence of the committee and the Senators from Colorado, I wish to move an amendment to the amendment. After the word "situate," in the committee amendment, I move to insert the words "in the State of Colorado and."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "situate," in the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert the words "in the State of Colorado and"; so as to read:

Situate in the State of Colorado and in the State of Wyoming outside of the boundary lines of the Yellowstone National Park.

Mr. PASCO. Is the effect of the amendment to the amendment simply to extend the same privileges to the people of Colorado? Is that the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. CLARK. That is the effect of it.

Mr. PASCO. I have no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "refined," to strike out "and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory"; so as to read:

Any pipe line company or corporation formed for the purpose of transporting oils, crude or refined, which shall have filed or may hereafter file with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 17, before the word "located," to insert the word "so"; so as to read:

Provided, That no such right of way shall be so located as to interfere with the proper occupation by the Government of any reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the words "pipe line," to insert "if the same be upon surveyed lands and"; so as to read:

That any company or corporation desiring to secure the benefits of this act shall within twelve months after the location of 10 miles of the pipe line, if the same be upon surveyed lands, and if the same be upon unsurveyed lands, within twelve months after the survey thereof by the United States, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a map of its line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 1, after the word "authorize," to strike out "such pipe line to occupy" and insert "the use of"; in line 4, before the word "construction," to strike out "the" and insert "its"; and in the same line, after the word "care," to strike out "of said pipe line"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That nothing in this act shall authorize the use of such right of way except for the pipe line, and then only so far as may be necessary for its construction, maintenance, and care.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I wish the Senator from Wyoming would state what the proposed pipe lines are for.

Mr. CLARK. The bill grants the right of way for pipe lines over the public domain for the purpose of transporting oil, crude and refined.

Mr. CALL. To whom is the privilege granted? Is it given to any particular company?

Mr. CLARK. No. It is granted to those who wish to take advantage of it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PASCO. I suggest that the title be amended so as to show as to what States the bill applies.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill to grant right of way over the public domain for pipe lines in the States of Colorado and Wyoming."

BRIDGE ACROSS SULPHUR RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOPHIA D. CLENDENIN.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 177) granting a pension to Sophia D. Clendenin.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to fill the blank by inserting the word "fifty," and in the same line, after the word "month," to insert "in lieu of the pension she is now receiving"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Sophia D. Clendenin, widow of David R. Clendenin, late colonel of Second Cavalry, United States Army, and brevet brigadier-general, at the rate of $50 a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Sophia D. Clendenin."

GEORGE M. BROOKS.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 637) granting a pension to George M. Brooks.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension rolls the name of George M. Brooks, late private in Company D of the Sixty-ninth Regiment of Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and pay to him a pension of $15 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REAR-ADMIRAL JOHN H. RUSSELL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the bill (S. 1989) to authorize the payment to Rear-Admiral John H. Russell of the highest pay of his grade may be considered at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to know if there is any objection to striking out the preamble of the bill just passed reciting the officer's history.

Mr. PLATT. It is not a preamble. It is in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is in the body of the bill. This is a very meritorious case. Admiral Russell was a very gallant officer. I have answered the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts. If the Senator wishes to alter the language, however, I will move to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, and allow the bill to remain on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I do not care to interfere with the bill, but I should like to move to strike out so much of the bill as recites the officer's history.

Mr. HILL. If the preamble is so much more valuable than the bill, I suggest that the bill proper be stricken out and the preamble retained.

Mr. CHANDLER subsequently said: I wish to make a correction in the bill which has just been passed, by striking out in line 3 the words "eminent and," and in lines 16 and 17 the words "and has never received any special promotion or advancement in numbers."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent, the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed will be reconsidered, and the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to. The bill stands passed as amended.

WILLIAM S. GRANT.

Mr. BACON. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 662) for the relief of William S. Grant.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $77,989.38 to be paid to William S. Grant, in full satisfaction of his claims against the United States arising out of his contract to supply military posts in Arizona in the years 1860 and 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider Senate bill 662, which was just passed. Let the motion be entered. I wish to look at the case. I may withdraw it subsequently.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered as indicated.

Mr. PLATT subsequently said: I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 662 was passed. I have examined the report and withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn, and the bill stands passed.

GEORGE B. CUSTER.

Mr. ROACH. I ask leave to call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1806) granting a pension to George B. Custer, late private of Company H, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "private" and insert "sergeant"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of George B. Custer, late sergeant, Company H, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $20 per month, said pension to be for injuries to right hand, right foot, and right ankle received in service and line of duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to George B. Custer, late sergeant of Company H, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry."

NORTH GERMAN LLOYD STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 644) to refund certain import duties.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Messrs. Oelrichs & Co., the agents of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, $6,571.45, to be in full for import duties imposed, collected, and paid into the United States Treasury on a propeller shaft and appurtenances, four propeller blades, one propeller boss, one steam tube, and two boxes of iron and brass, part of the machinery of the steamship Werra, at the port of New York, owned by the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, and to pay to the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, or their duly accredited agents at the port of Baltimore, $2,422.35, in full for import duties imposed, collected, and paid into the United States Treasury on a steel crank shaft, part of the machinery of the steamship Strassburg, at the port of Baltimore, owned by the North German Lloyd Steamship Company.

Mr. FRYE. What committee reported the bill?

Mr. BURROWS. The Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. Was it reported unanimously?

Mr. BURROWS. Unanimously.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CADDO LAKE BRIDGE.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1723) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge over and across Caddo Lake at Mooringsport, La., by the Kansas City, Shreveport and Gulf Railway Company.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 9, after the word "bridge," to insert "and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 3, to strike out "river" and insert "lake."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 6, after the word "alteration," to insert:

And to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for file, a design and drawings of said bridge and a map of the location, prepared with reference to a known datum plane, upon prescribed scale, furnished by the engineer officer having supervision of said lake, giving, for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the location of the bridge, the topography of the banks of the lake, with shore lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 3, to insert the following proviso:

Provided also, That said bridge shall be so kept and managed by the company owning or operating it as to afford during the periods at which the lake is navigable proper ways and means for the passage through or under it of vessels, barges, or rafts, both by day and by night; and during the periods at which the lake is navigable there shall be displayed on said bridge from sunset to sunrise such lights and signals as may be directed by the Light-House Board.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EUNICE TRIPLER.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 314) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Eunice Tripler, widow of Surg. Charles S. Tripler, United States Army, $3,000, for services by Charles S. Tripler in his lifetime in preparing, superintending, and directing the publication of a manual for the medical officers of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT KLAMATH HAY RESERVATION.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 5286) providing for disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath hay reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all lands lying within the boundaries of the Fort Klamath hay reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, shall be open to the operation of the laws regulating homestead entry. But the disposal of the lands shall be made in tracts not exceeding 80 acres to any one bona fide settler thereon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. ROACH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments to the House bill and agree to the bill as passed by the House.

RICHARD F. PETTIGREW,
WILLIAM N. ROACH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JAMES S. SHERMAN,
JOHN S. LITTLE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

RED RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 5, line 10, after the word "expense," to insert:

And if, after thirty days' notice from the Secretary of War to the president of the railroad company, or to other parties owning or controlling said bridge, the changes or alterations required shall not be made, the Secretary shall cause such changes to be made, and the cost thereof shall be recovered by suit in the name of the United States against said company in the circuit court of the United States within whose jurisdiction said bridge or any part thereof is situated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senate to take from the table for consideration the bill (H. R. 3337) amending the act of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or Marine Corps to perform the duties of Solicitor and Judge-Advocate-General, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer," and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend the act of June 8, 1880, by inserting in that act, in lieu of the words "with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Navy, or a colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be," the words "with the rank and highest pay of a captain in the Navy, or the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel in the Marine Corps, as the case may be"; and provides that the amendment shall take effect from July 19, 1892, the date on which the present incumbent entered on duty.

Mr. CARTER. I should be glad to have the Senator from Maine explain upon what basis this bill is to be made retroactive. As I understand its terms, it provides that the pay of this officer shall be increased and that the increased pay shall relate back to a date in the year 1892. I desire information as to the view of the committee in justifying a favorable report upon the bill.

Mr. HALE. The bill provides that the salary which has been given heretofore to the officer holding this most important place—and it is one of the most important in the Navy Department, as Senators know who have business with that Department—shall be given to the present incumbent, an exceedingly meritorious man, a very able man, a man of complete integrity. The date is fixed, I will say to the Senator from Montana, because that was the date when he came into the office of Judge-Advocate-General. He had, owing to the illness and condition of his predecessor, largely done the work two years before that time, but he has held the office with the reduced pay since the date fixed. Therefore, that time is fixed so that he may have the same pay that his predecessor had and may have the benefit he would have received if he had been taken from the Marine Corps instead of the line. In that case he would have had the same pay that is proposed to be given him by the bill under consideration.

Mr. CARTER. What is the present pay of the officer according to his grade?

Mr. HALE. I think the bill gives him about $3,500 and he gets about $2,300 or $2,400. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who knows the pay table of the Navy, can state more accurately.

Mr. CHANDLER. I can not answer the precise question. I vote for this bill in order to give the present incumbent the same compensation that his predecessor, Colonel Remey, received. Colonel Remey received the pay of a colonel in the Army, having been taken from the Marine Corps and given this office. Lieutenant Lemly gets only the shore pay of a captain in the Navy, and it is necessary to give him the highest pay of a captain in the Navy in order to make his pay equal to the pay of a colonel in the Army, which is what his predecessor received.

Mr. HALE. I think it is about $700 or $800 a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, ordinarily I would not vote for making a bill of this kind retroactive, yet in view of the fact that this officer did the larger portion of the work of the office while his predecessor was disabled and before his predecessor left the office, and has done the work with signal ability since, I am in favor of giving him the same pay from the time when he took the office that his predecessor received.

Mr. CARTER. Does any member of the Committee on Naval Affairs know what the present pay of the officer is and what his pay would be under the proposed act? I suggest that the bill go over until we can examine it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will tell the Senator exactly what the effect of the bill is. He will get the pay of a captain at sea, which is the same as the pay of a colonel in the Army. I have not in my mind exactly the amount, but it is about $4,000.

Mr. CARTER. It seems that this officer accepted the appointment and has for the past four years discharged the duties of the office voluntarily. I do not know of any law compelling the gentleman to discharge the duties of the office unless the pay is satisfactory. The bill, as I understand it, proposes by its retroactive clause to give him in one sum the difference between the pay his predecessor received and the pay he has been receiving for the last four years, an indefinite amount.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Montana will permit me, I should like to state that the effect of the bill is simply to amend the present law so as to overcome a defect in it. Under the ruling of the Department this officer does not receive the pay that under the law he was entitled to when he took the place. The law provides that the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy shall be appointed either from the rank of colonel in the Army or captain in the Navy. The salary of a colonel in the Army and a captain in the Navy, it seems, are the same. Therefore the person who drew the act intended, of course, that the pay should be the same for the Judge-Advocate-General whether he was taken from the Army or the Navy. But through an oversight in the person drawing the act he failed to notice that the pay of captain in the Navy is different on land and at sea. The pay of a captain at sea is exactly the same as that of a colonel in the Army, and hence the act provided and Congress intended that the pay should be the same whether the officer came from the Army or the Navy.

The Department, in ruling on the question, held that inasmuch as the act was indefinite and inasmuch as a captain on land receives less pay than a captain at sea, the act meant that he should receive the smaller salary. The pending bill is intended simply to correct that mistake and put it where it was evidently the intention of the law to put it, so that he shall receive the same pay as a colonel in the Army or a captain at sea.

Mr. HALE. That is a very apposite statement. I have the figures now. I sent for the Register. It is the difference between shore-duty pay, which is $3,500, and $4,500, a difference of $1,000, instead of seven or eight hundred dollars, as I stated.

Mr. CARTER. For many years the offices of surveyor-general of the various public-land States and Territories have been held by gentlemen who had a right to believe that they would receive from appropriations from time to time the full sum of $3,000 per annum provided by law as the compensation for persons holding the offices referred to. It has become the practice to appropriate each year a sum ranging from $500 to $1,000 less than the amount specified in the law as the compensation of those officers. Every season when an appropriation bill is under consideration letters are received from every State in the Union where such officers are engaged in the discharge of their duties, requesting not only an adequate appropriation to meet the amount provided by law for the salary in the future, but likewise to provide for back pay equal to the difference between the amount heretofore appropriated and the amount required by law. I have universally encountered the objection that those gentlemen were not compelled by any existing law to remain in the respective offices to which they were appointed, nor that any law exists compelling them to qualify.

The rule applied by the Committee on Appropriations in both Houses of Congress invariably, in response to that line of petition, constitutes a principle properly applicable to this case. Whatsoever may be correct or adequate compensation for the future is a matter in the discretion of Congress to determine; but when this officer has for four years voluntarily filled this office and discharged its duties for the compensation provided by law, I am opposed to his receiving additional compensation because of his extraordinary industry or ability on account of his location to importune the committees. He should not be accorded as a reward for his industry in this behalf particular consideration by having his pay rerated for the four years during which he has voluntarily served.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to state that the object of the bill is to correct a clear error or blunder in the draft of an act of Congress, and that the bill only gives him the salary which it is clear Congress intended to give him. A colonel in the Army and a captain in the Navy have the same pay. The statute provides that he shall have the pay of a colonel in the Army or a captain in the Navy, but it turns out that a captain in the Navy has under certain circumstances a reduction in his pay, and the Department thought they were obliged to give this officer the reduced sum. The bill is therefore the mere correction of a mistake in the draft of an act.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that it was undoubtedly the intention in the original act to give the officer, whether he was taken from the Marine Corps or from the line of the Navy, the same pay, and the mistake was not found out as long as the officer was taken from the Marine Corps. He then got the pay of a colonel in the Army. The moment they took an officer from the line in the Navy it appears that he can only get the reduced pay of a captain in the Navy and not the full pay of a captain in the Navy, which is equal to the pay of a colonel in the Army.

Mr. CARTER. It seems that three sessions of Congress have passed since this condition arose. I do not wish to object to the consideration of the bill, but I will exercise the right to move an amendment by striking out the proviso which relates to back pay. I move that the bill be amended by striking out the proviso at the end thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The clause proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That this amendment shall take effect from July 19, 1892, the date on which the present incumbent entered on duty, and that the amount herein appropriated shall be payable from the appropriation "pay of the Navy."

Mr. HALE. I can add nothing to what has been stated by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. I hope the amendment will not prevail, because if there ever was a case of pure equity where an officer should have the full pay from the time he entered the office, it seems to me this is one. I simply ask for a vote of the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. Having uniformly given the same answer to gentlemen who have approached me on the matter of rerating their pay after they had voluntarily performed the services for the amount specified, I can not now consent to this bill passing, save with the amendment I have proposed. On general principles back pay and back salary should, I think, be discountenanced in dealing with public officials. Where men are impressed into the Army or Navy in time of war, without any discretion possible on their part, where the compensation allowed by law is inadequate, or where in the line of duty severe injury has been sustained, then a proper pension or a rerating of the salary may be equitable.

But in this case voluntary service was accepted, and no doubt most vigorously solicited, if you please. The office has now been occupied by this gentleman for four long years.

Mr. HALE. He received it by regular promotion. He had been doing duty as assistant, and the position naturally fell to him without solicitation.

Mr. CARTER. Is it not true that the civil-service rules do not apply to this office?

Mr. HALE. They do not apply to this class of officers in any Department. This is one of the most important offices in the Navy.

Mr. CARTER. Then this officer, who was discharging the duties of an assistant, went into open competition with qualified persons everywhere for appointment to this place, and secured the appointment, I suppose? He was appointed. I doubt not the records of the Navy Department would disclose the fact that divers persons, well qualified, were willing to accept the place at the salary being received in other branches of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. No; that was not true. At that time there was a universal feeling on the part of everybody having to do with the Navy Department—I know something about that—that this man, who had really for about two years been doing the duties of the head office and who succeeded to it, should also receive the salary connected with it. Nobody then, as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, had ever thought or knew that there was this defect in the law. He took the place without any question, and supposed that he would get the same as his predecessor, a captain's full pay.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator to allow me to supplement that statement. There was no doubt at all expressed that the Judge-Advocate-General could go and take a colonel's pay if he chose to do so. The case is not that which the Senator from Montana is describing, where an officer, knowing perfectly well what the salary of a position was, took it. This gentleman took the office, and it was believed for a long time that he was entitled to $4,500 a year. This bill is only brought forward in consequence of a decision of the Comptroller making this difference, which nobody believes exists.

Mr. CARTER. For what period of time after this appointment did he continue to receive payment for his services at $4,500 a year?

Mr. CHANDLER. None at all. The question was raised; it was held by the Comptroller for a time; then the decision was made, and immediately the subject was presented to Congress. The Senator knows that we do not legislate very fast here. All this time has run on, and he has lost this money unless the Senator will allow him to have it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it must be conceded that the officer discovered nearly four years ago the defect in the law as to the compensation attached to that office when held by him. Three sessions of Congress—not three sessions, but nearly three full Congresses—have expired since that time, and I assume the fact to be that these matters were presented in the three preceding Congresses and were considered by committees and reported upon adversely or not reported upon at all. I think it well to have the bill relate to the future, and the amendment will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRYE. I inquire if this discussion is proceeding under the rule which requires that there shall not be more than one speech made by a Senator, and that it shall be under the five-minute rule?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is what I should like to know also.

Mr. FRYE. Or is the discussion proceeding by unanimous consent? I am very anxious to have a little bill passed here.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. So am I.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator from Montana is going to demand a division on the question whether or not the amendment shall be adopted——

Mr. BUTLER. I believe I am entitled to the floor. I have no speech to make; but I want to make a statement.

Mr. FRYE. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the awkward situation in which his amendment will leave the law. The effect of it would be not only to deprive the present Judge-Advocate-General of the same salary which his predecessor received, and which he is entitled to under the spirit and intent of the law, but it would leave the law so that one Judge-Advocate-General would receive one salary, while another Judge-Advocate-General, performing the same duties, would receive another salary.

If the Senator thinks that the salary of the Judge-Advocate-General is too large, and will offer an amendment to make a reasonable reduction in the salary, whether the place is filled by an officer from the Army or from the Navy, I should be inclined to vote for his amendment; but even such an amendment as that should not date back and deprive the present occupant of the salary to which he is already entitled for services rendered up to date.

The bill as it stands is simply to correct a clerical error in the wording of the law and to give to the present occupant of the office what everyone who has filled it before him has received. The present Judge-Advocate-General, on account of the illness of his predecessor, performed the duties of the office for several years before he was appointed to it. He does not ask extra pay for that extra work, though Congress has often by special appropriation made such payment to minor officers who performed the duties of their superiors. He simply asks what he is entitled to, what he expected to receive when he accepted the office, and what everyone admits was the intent and purpose of the law.

Mr. CARTER. The logic of the Senator's position would conflict with a report made a few days ago by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, increasing the salary of the postmaster at Washington City. If the rule suggested should be applied, then that report should recommend that for all time gone by during which the volume of business was as much as at present the same salary provided for the future should apply. The fact is, that the duties of the office were voluntarily performed up to this date, and the salary for the service being a stated amount is no just cause why there should be an increase primarily, nor if the salary be increased would that be just cause for rerating it up to the time the service commenced.

Mr. PEFFER. I think this bill had better be considered when the Senate has more members present than at this time.

Mr. CULLOM (to Mr. PEFFER). Move to adjourn.

Mr. PEFFER. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the bill will go over under the rule.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MORGAN. I introduce a joint resolution at this time, which I ask to have printed and go over.

The joint resolution (S. R. 105) declaring that a state of public war exists in the Island of Cuba was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That it is hereby declared that a state of public war exists in the Island of Cuba between the Government of Spain and the people of that island who are supporting a separate Government under the name of the Republic of Cuba, and the state of belligerency between said Governments is hereby recognized.

Mr. HOAR. I inquire if that comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. MORGAN. It comes from the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HOAR. A highly admirable source.

Mr. MORGAN. I am obliged to the Senator. I assure him that I intend to press it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

EXCHANGE OF LAND AT CHOCTAW POINT, ALABAMA.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1872) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange in behalf of the United States the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., now belonging to the United States and held for light-house purposes, with the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railway Company for any other tract or parcel of land in said county equally well or better adapted for use for light-house purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 20, after the word "purposes," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the exchange herein provided for shall be without expense to the United States.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to exchange in behalf of the United States the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., belonging to the United States and held for light-house purposes, with the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company for any other tract or parcel of land in said county which it may offer in exchange therefor and which shall be approved of by the Light-House Board as equally well or better adapted to use for light-house purposes; and, upon making such exchange, the Secretary of the Treasury shall execute and deliver to said company a quitclaim deed for said Choctaw Point tract, and shall take from it a proper conveyance vesting in the United States title to the tract or parcel of land to be taken in exchange, together with delivery of possession of such tract, such title to be passed upon by the Attorney-General of the United States in the usual manner; and said tract or parcel of land so taken in exchange shall be held and used for light-house purposes: Provided, That the exchange herein provided for shall be without expense to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if there should not be some provision that the land exchanged should be of equal value? Land might be good for light-house purposes and yet worth ten times as much as the other.

Mr. FRYE. I think this is a matter which is all arranged between the Light-House Board and the railroad company. The land which the Light-House Board is to get is a good deal better and more valuable in every respect for the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I shall move in line 11, after the word "purposes," to insert "and of equal value"; so as to read:

And which shall be approved by the Light-House Board as equally well or better adapted to use for light-house purposes, and of equal value.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that, though the land is all alike there.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON AND CANNON BALLS.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4463) to grant two condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth Separate Company National Guard of State of New York.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "balls," to insert:

And to the Forty-third Separate Company National Guard of State of New York, for their armory at Olean, N. Y., two pieces of condemned cannon and sufficient cannon balls for four pyramids.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the Thirteenth Separate Company National Guard of the State of New York, for their armory at Jamestown, N. Y., two condemned cannon and sufficient cannon balls; and to the Forty-third Separate Company National Guard of State of New York, for their armory at Olean, N. Y., two pieces of condemned cannon and sufficient cannon balls for four pyramids: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HILL, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to grant certain condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth and Forty-third Companies National Guard of State of New York.

SURVEY OF MOUTHS OF YUKON RIVER, ALASKA.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1796) making an appropriation for a governmental survey of the mouths of the Yukon River, in Alaska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary"; in line 7, after the word "recognizance," to strike out "and survey"; and in line 10, after the words "Norton Sound," to strike out "at which point freight and passengers are now transferred to Yukon River steamers, and for the purpose of making a thorough survey of the mouth or mouths, if more than one, of said river," and insert "and to ascertain what equipments and means are necessary for a thorough examination and survey of the entrances to and mouths of said river"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey by proper reconnoissance to ascertain whether there is not a southern channel entrance to the Yukon River, Alaska, for sailing vessels, which would obviate the necessity for going as far north as Norton Sound, and to ascertain what equipments and means are necessary for a thorough examination and survey of the entrances to and mouths of said river.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making an appropriation for a reconnoissance of the mouths of the Yukon River, in Alaska."

HOLMES & LEATHERS.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1506) for the relief of Holmes & Leathers.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to T. P. Leathers, surviving partner of the firm of Holmes & Leathers, $12,910.35, being amount due them for transporting the United States mail on route No. 7402, Mississippi, and on route No. 8165, Louisiana, for months of April and May, 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like some explanation of that bill from the Senator from Louisiana. I see it is a bill to grant compensation for carrying mails in 1861, or thereabouts. I have in memory that there were some cases where contractors were paid by the Confederate government for carrying the mails where they afterwards made claim against the United States for payment also. Is this one of those cases?

Mr. CAFFERY. Of course this case is subject to that suspicion [laughter]; but it is a case where the records of the Treasury Department disclose that no payment was ever made by the Confederate States to Holmes & Leathers; and there is an affidavit of Mr. Leathers that no payment was ever made to him. The Auditor of the Treasury states that the amount named stands on the books of the Treasury to the credit of these parties, Holmes & Leathers.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know there were cases where the contractors got pay from the Confederate government. They kept on carrying the mails after secession, and the Confederate government paid them in Confederate money, which was pretty good at that time. Afterwards it depreciated somewhat, I believe [laughter]; and later, after the Union was restored and Louisiana was again within the Union, those parties wanted better money than the Confederate money, and came and asked that the United States would pay them. I do not wish to oppose the Senator's bill improperly or to his annoyance in any way; I am perfectly willing it should pass if it is a proper bill; but I prefer to examine it before it passes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I will state that this claim has been before the Committee on Claims for some time. As the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] states, it was made known to the Senate and to Congress very plainly some years ago that many of these claims which were presented here had been paid as stated, and it was difficult for the Post-Office Department to determine from their records what claims had been paid and what claims had not been paid. Finally, certain Confederate records were discovered, certain parties here having charge of them, which were supposed to disclose all the facts in regard to these various contracts, showing who had been paid and who had not been paid. They were in the possession of private parties, who came to Congress and proposed to sell them to the Government for a certain amount. We passed an act appropriating something like ten or twelve thousand dollars for the purchase of those records. The Government purchased them, as I understand, and the Government is now in possession of records which enable the Post-Office Department to determine very nearly correctly as to all these contracts. This particular claim of Holmes & Leathers has been before the committee; it was investigated at the last session, and the committee was of the opinion that it was a good claim.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will state to the Senator from Oregon that while this claim was pending before the Committee on Claims, I addressed a letter to the Treasury Department to know whether or not there was any evidence to show from the Confederate archives that this claim had ever come before the Confederate government, and I received a reply, which is not in the report, that there was no evidence whatever disclosed in those archives that Holmes & Leathers had ever been paid. Following this is an affidavit of Captain Leathers, attached to the report, that not a dollar has been paid to him, and the amount stands to his credit, or to the credit of Holmes & Leathers, on the books of the Treasury Department to-day. It never has been paid by the Confederate States.

Mr. CHANDLER. When was the transportation of the mails for which compensation is now proposed to be paid performed?

Mr. CAFFERY. About 1861.

Mr. CHANDLER. During 1861?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was it not transportation over a territory which was in possession of the rebel government, and was not this, in other words, transportation done for the Confederates?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. And not for Union citizens?

Mr. CAFFERY. No, sir. The transportation of the mails was prior to the breaking out of hostilities between the United States and the Confederate States, and the bill is for the relief of Holmes & Leathers, mail contractors, for services rendered by them to the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And not for the service of the Confederate States.

Mr. CAFFERY. Not at all.

Mr. PLATT. Was not this claim before the Senate for action at the last session?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; and the bill was passed. A similar bill has repeatedly passed the Committee on Claims, and last year it passed the Senate. It is a just claim. Captain Leathers has never been paid either by the Confederate States or the United States for services rendered to the United States, and I think he ought to be paid.

Mr. PLATT. I have an impression, which scarcely amounts to a recollection, that there was an effort made at the last session of the Senate to have this amount passed upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. PASCO. I think that effort was made and that the effort failed.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. CAFFERY. It was never put on the appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I made the effort myself to have it put on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did not the junior Senator from Louisiana make a long speech in behalf of this claim?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I made a speech; I do not know how long it was.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was it not an hour or so?

Mr. BLANCHARD. No; I think probably about fifteen minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I knew something had impressed this claim upon me unfavorably. [Laughter.] It must have been—I remember now it was—a speech of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]; but I will make amends to the two Senators from Louisiana by saying that after the clear and distinct manner in which this case has been put by the two Senators from Louisiana, aided by the Senator from Oregon, I am myself entirely willing that the bill shall pass.

Mr. PLATT. I understand that, although the Southern States went into rebellion in April, 1861, the mails from New Orleans eastward or westward, and perhaps both, were carried by Government contractors for some time subsequent to that date, and in this case up to May 31, and that the Post-Office Department cut off all payments subsequent to April 19, 1861.

Mr. CAFFERY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that that is exactly what this claim is for.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; including also the amount which had been earned up to that date from the time of the last payment; and yet some of the contractors had no notice that the Government would do so, and they kept on carrying the mails so long as they could. In this case the mails were carried up to May 31.

Mr. CAFFERY. No demand whatever was made for any payment after Louisiana had seceded.

Mr. PLATT. Unless there was payment sought from the Confederate government, I think the Government of the United States ought to pay this claim.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will read an extract from the letter of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department in relation to the claim. He says:

> There stands to the credit of Holmes & Leathers for service from January 1 to May 31, 1861, on route No. 7402, the sum of $6,207.05, and for service from April 1 to May 31, 1861, on route No. 8165, the sum of $6,703.30, a total of $12,910.35.

That was prior to the declaration of hostilities between the United States and the Confederate States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER DALY.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1119) granting an increase of pension to Peter Daly.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "month," to strike out "in lieu of the pension he now receives"; so as to make the bill read:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, Peter Daly, late of Company K, First Regiment of United States Infantry, and pay him a pension of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Peter Daly."

MONUMENT TO THE MARYLAND LINE IN THE REVOLUTION.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider the bill (S. 1312) to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five"; so as to read:

> That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by the Maryland Society of the Sons of the American Revolution to aid in erecting in the city of Baltimore, Md., a suitable monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland Line in the war for American independence, the money to be paid to the society aforesaid under the order of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERCHANT MARINE ENGINEER SERVICE.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1242) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. SQUIRE. I will state that this is a bill which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is entirely in favor of as amended by the committee. He said to me that it could be passed at any time without objection on his part.

Mr. PLATT. I was going to say that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is not here.

Mr. SQUIRE. He is not here; but I have a distinct understanding with the chairman of the committee that I can put the bill on its passage.

Mr. HALE. How long a bill is it?

Mr. SQUIRE. It is a very brief bill.

Mr. PLATT. Is this the one which provides for American merchant engineers——

Mr. SQUIRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. And which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says ought not to apply to the steamships which were taken from a foreign line and incorporated into an American line?

Mr. SQUIRE. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Connecticut, that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has gone through the bill carefully; it has been amended in committee, and it is entirely satisfactory to him, and I believe it is in the main satisfactory to the Association of Merchant Marine Engineers of the United States. In some particulars they would have liked it a little different. But in the main essential particulars, such as having American engineers, it is complete and satisfactory to them. I believe it ought to be passed and that it will give great satisfaction to this large body of men, numbering about 19,000 in the United States.

Mr. PLATT. I know there has been a great pressure here for legislation by an association of engineers, and I know that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], when the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] tried to call up the bill before or presented some petition about it, made a statement on the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SQUIRE. If the Senator from Maryland will indulge me for a moment, I will state that when I introduced the bill originally I did make a short statement in which I remarked on the fact that some of the American lines were not employing American engineers, as was contemplated at the time of the passage of the act giving the subsidy; that it was contemplated to correct that practice, and that was the provision of the bill. Now, since that time the bill has been submitted to the committee; it has been passed upon and amended, a few amendments being reported.

I wish to state to the Senate that there is no conflict whatever at the present moment. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] will kindly accept my statement of the fact that Mr. FRYE, the chairman of the committee, said to me that he himself would have put the measure on its passage had he been present. He said he thought it was due to me that I should ask for its consideration. There is no objection whatever to the immediate passage of the bill. There was a little misunderstanding at one time. I believe it has all been done away with, however, and there is now an entirely satisfactory condition of affairs on both sides.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Washington that I am heartily in accord with his general view. I am on the Committee on Commerce, which has considered the bill and has reported it unanimously, I believe, but at the same time my impression is that one or two gentlemen who were looking at the matter gave an intimation that they wanted to have something to say on the bill when it came before the Senate and possibly suggest an amendment. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Washington that he call up the bill at some other time.

Mr. SQUIRE. I was hoping the bill could go through this evening. If the Senator from Maryland does not object, I prefer, unless there is real objection——

Mr. GORMAN. I may not have any objection to the bill, but I am under the impression that some Senators desire to say something about it on the floor.

Mr. HALE. Evidently this bill can not be passed this evening, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 23, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 20, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AMBASSADOR BAYARD.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business, and yield the floor for ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to inquire how the time stands now. How much time have we on the side of the opposition to the resolutions and how much have they on the side in favor of the resolutions?

The SPEAKER. Since the arrangement was made yesterday the side represented by the gentleman from Kentucky has occupied forty-one minutes and the other side twenty-nine.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. How much remains to the side I represent?

The SPEAKER. Fifty-six minutes; that, of course, is subject to reduction for practical purposes.

Mr. HITT. How much has the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. Twelve minutes more.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. You mean twelve minutes more than the side I represent.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must recollect some time is taken out in the adjustment of matters, and allowance must be made for that.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, the debate on this question during the past two days has taken such a wide range that I desire, as a member of the committee having this matter in charge, to lead it back to the proper channels through which it should be discussed to have some direct bearing on the question at issue. Before giving my reasons as a member of this committee for voting for these resolutions I desire to testify my personal respect for the person of Thomas F. Bayard and my profound admiration for him as one of that class of Americans who have given the best part of their lives to public service, and who, after a long period of thirty years, has never had a slur cast on his integrity or doubt as to the honesty of his purpose. But, Mr. Speaker, so long as men shall remain in public life so long are their actions subject to fair criticism at the hands of both friend and foe. When in our diplomatic service the rank of ambassador was first instituted and the Democratic President had the right to select one of our citizens to fill that high office, the first time it had ever been conferred upon an American citizen, of all the distinguished men in our country at his disposition he chose to honor Thomas F. Bayard to fill that office.

I will pause here a moment to ask what were the new duties, the new functions, that were imposed upon this raised rank in our diplomatic service? In the congress which assembled in Vienna in 1814 to define the duties and the precedence of the men in the diplomatic service, it was there laid down that ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary were the agents of the diplomatic and business duties conducted between Governments; but it was further laid down that ambassadors were the personal representatives of the sovereign powers whom they represented. Therefore, sir, I ask what new duty and what new function devolved upon Hon. Thomas F. Bayard when he assumed this high office by the gift of the American people? Sir, he became the personal representative of the sovereign American people; and when he said aught to attack or belittle the honor or the integrity or the political honesty of the American people he was more to be condemned, in my judgment, than the foreign ambassador who would dare to say aught to belittle the dignity and the majesty of his royal master.

Now, sir, we have condemned or are about to condemn the utterances of Thomas F. Bayard, and I wish to call attention to where these were uttered. In the first place, sir, I doubt very materially whether it becomes the dignity of the ambassador of the great American people to travel down to this little grammar school at Boston to give prizes to students; but whether it does come properly within his function or not, I deny that it is proper for the personal representative of the sovereignty of the American people when he goes down to this grammar school at Boston to teach his audience that the experiment that the American people have made in respect to self-government is a failure, and that we need, not the amiable lady that presides over the destinies of the Empire of Great Britain to restrain us, but that a strong man, with an iron will, must control these turbulent inhabitants of this great Republic of ours.

And, sir, look what consequences this may lead to. These were the clever youths of Great Britain, the men who in the next generation may sit in Parliament and guide the helm of state, and they will be there able to say in the debates on the floor of the House of Commons that they heard the American ambassador, the personal representative of the American people, assert that our Government was practically a failure, and when they come to consider the will and the votes and the judgment of the American people they will say that our ambassador told them we were turbulent and violent and had to be restrained by a stronger ruler than the sovereign of Great Britain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been some question made as to the propriety of this House of Representatives casting any reflection upon an ambassador abroad, and it has been argued that it does not come within the province or the duties of this body. I am free to admit, sir, that if this were a question as to some negotiation pending between the two Governments it might have been proper for the President, in response to our inquiries, to have said that it was incompatible with the public interest to disclose the matter. But no such question confronts this House. We, the representatives of the American people, are here to justify and defend the American people, whom their representative has reflected upon in his official capacity abroad. We addressed a communication to the President of the United States and he responded in very curt language:

> I reply that no action has been taken by the President except such as is indicated in the report and correspondence herewith submitted.

How were the American people to resent these reflections upon them, these utterances of our ambassador to England, unless it was through their representatives sitting here in Congress? Therefore we stand here to-day and on their behalf we do resent these reflections upon the American people.

Now, sir, I regret that I can not find any excuse to make for our ambassador in England. He is not like that other Democratic ambassador who represents us at the Republic of France who, when he was approached by an itinerant book vender, took him into his confidence, disclosed his innermost thoughts upon all the questions pending between the countries of the earth, and then when he saw it in public print expressed his amazement that he had been so deceived.

Sir, that illustrates one weakness of our diplomatic system, that we take gentlemen from the walks of private life and send them as our diplomatic representatives abroad, so that it is no wonder they sometimes fail, as in the case of our ambassador to France. But Mr. Bayard had no such excuse. He had been thirty years in public life. He had been Secretary of State, and had been in personal contact and communication with the trained diplomats who represent their several Governments here in Washington. He had been Secretary of State and had issued his orders to his subordinates, those whom he had sent abroad as our representatives. Those orders have been read in this House, and they show that he instructed those subordinates that they must not publicly discuss or refer to public questions. And, Mr. Speaker, I will show this House out of the mouth of Mr. Bayard himself what his own calm judgment was upon this question. I hold in my hand a speech delivered by Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, on October 16, 1894, at Wilmington, Del. In addressing the citizens of that place on that occasion he said:

> I have been sent abroad to represent no party. I went to represent my whole country. I went to represent the honor of the nation.

These words show that when Mr. Bayard went abroad as our diplomatic representative he knew his duties, he knew what they were; so I say, there are no mitigating circumstances or excuses for the indiscretion committed by the Hon. Thomas F. Bayard. Therefore it is that, upon calm reflection on this question, and having had some slight experience in the diplomatic service myself, I feel I am justified, as I was in committee, in voting to pass these resolutions; that I am justified now in casting my vote in this House that the American people as well as their representatives denounce the language used by Mr. Bayard in these addresses, resent the reflections cast upon the people of our country. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, permission was given yesterday on my suggestion to gentlemen to extend their remarks in the RECORD, but as it occurred in an intercalary way while some gentleman was speaking, it failed to get into the RECORD, and I repeat it now, so that gentlemen may take notice. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, it is with some degree of diffidence I venture to entertain opinions on this subject differing from those of the learned gentlemen who have united in the majority report of the Foreign Affairs Committee. In diplomatic matters I would ordinarily accept without question conclusions advocated by one who has had the long and honorable career in the diplomatic service possessed by the highly esteemed chairman of that committee. But when we are advised by my learned friends that the conduct of the American ambassador at the Court of St. James was as unprecedented as it was reprehensible, we are advised of a situation where precedent fails to point out a remedy and where diplomatic experience may therefore not be an infallible guide. Especially is this true where the advice of diplomacy appears stamped with conservatism when conservatism would compromise with insult, and influenced by timidity when timidity may be a crime. If the wrong of the ambassador be unprecedented, then the time is now at hand, and will never return, for this House to place that wrong for all time upon its proper pedestal. Whatever definition we now give to that offense will be accepted by the country and by history. The duty devolves upon us to mete out punishment according to the offense. History will measure the offense according to the punishment.

Gentlemen on the other side of the House have challenged the good faith of the gentleman from Massachusetts in bringing this matter before the House in the form of an impeachment resolution. I for one sincerely hoped that my friend from Massachusetts would respond to that challenge by adhering to his original proposition. When, in the early days of the session, he stated on this floor that as an American citizen he had felt humiliated by the disgraceful act of this ambassador, he echoed the feelings of every member at least on this side of the Chamber. And I venture the opinion that to-day this House, with one voice, would be supporting impeachment charges could we but divorce this matter entirely from politics—were the patriotism of the minority not choked by partisan tares and the natural indignation of those who would defend America's fair name from insult not intimidated by the unworthy efforts of Democracy to drag this discussion from the high plane where love of country would place it and to wallow with it in their mire of partisan politics. And from that political slough we have heard the voice of their leaders derisively inquiring if we believed the ambassador guilty of an impeachable offense, well knowing, as they do, that it is our province to determine that very question. It is for us to say whether such offensive remarks uttered by such an official amid such surroundings constitute an impeachable offense, a censurable offense, or no offense whatever.

The majority report of the committee concludes that it is merely a censurable offense; the minority report says it is no offense at all. To me the language of the ambassador, uttered under circumstances that gave it additional force by reason of the very office he held, charging the American people, whom he was there to represent, with "corruption in public life," with a "blunted public conscience," with the "existence of false standards in the popular mind," with a "political system descending to the low level of a mercenary scramble," with a "popular conscience sapped by schemes of corruption"—such imputations under such circumstances sound very much like a misdemeanor and a crime. You ask me, Is it a high crime? I answer, it is a crime as high as the high office which this ambassador has so foully disgraced.

If the ambassador had only discussed local politics on foreign soil, without the use of libelous language, we might all admit him to be guilty of only a censurable offense. But what have the minority to say; what have my distinguished friends who have indorsed this majority report to say of this picture of "corrupt public life," of a "blunted public conscience," of a "popular conscience sapped by schemes of corrupting favor," which this ambassador held up before his foreign audience and falsely called it America? If such conduct be not a misdemeanor and a crime, then pray, under heaven, to what excesses of language would you apply those terms?

Sir, although history fails to record an offense comparable to the humiliating conduct of this discredited ambassador—although among the family of nations it has been left for the American people to be the first to suffer insult from their own ambassador in the presence of a foreign audience—we are not wholly at a loss in determining the penalty meet for the offense. Many years ago—so long ago, indeed, that the principles to which I shall now refer have become embodied in the common law—the courts of England had occasion to determine the law of criminal libel; the law that has guided the practice and decisions in every State in this Union adopting the common law. It so happens that one of the principles thus enunciated bears some resemblance to Bayard's transgression, approaching it as closely as human experience or the wildest flights of imagination permitted, up to the date of Bayard's epistle to the English. Let me read, and I quote from the leading authority on the law of slander and libel:

> Publications * * * the natural tendency of which is * * * to bring the Government or Constitution of the country into general contempt are * * * indictable as misdemeanors.

Thus the courts have spoken of libelous attacks against one's country. Trammeled neither by blind partisanship nor doubtful expediency of politics, they have bestowed upon such expressions the appropriate definition "criminal," and the fitting penalty, a felon's cell. And yet there is nothing in this description of a criminal offense contemplating the perpetration of the offense by an ambassador against the people of his own country, in an address specially prepared to tickle the fancies and prejudices of his foreign audience. And I appeal to gentlemen on the other side of the House, if without these accessories of official position and foreign auditors the judiciary have characterized the offense as criminal, are they not forced to admit that these contributory conditions make the transgression the more heinous? If the lesser offense be a crime, is not the more atrocious misdeed fittingly termed a high crime?

It is not my purpose (for I have not the time) to make as complete an application of the law of criminal libel as this case admits. But before concluding permit me to compare Bayard's utterances with expressions the use of which in this country by one private citizen of another has sent many a man to jail. The law is the same whether applied to utterances against government, as I have just shown, or against classes of men, or against individuals. The authority from which I have just quoted says that utterances are criminal libels which "reflect upon sects, classes, companies, or bodies of men, though not mentioning any person in particular." And the same has been held true in reference to libels of individuals "the tendency of which is to bring the subject of it into contempt and ridicule."

With this brief reference to the law of criminal libel, although for comparison I might refer to cases in every State of the Union, I shall refer only to one case—in the State of Georgia—for the purpose of placing side by side the expressions for which the Georgia defendant was found guilty and subjected to imprisonment and the grosser utterances of the guilty ambassador. I pass by with only slight reference Bayard's Boston speech. With a possible appreciation on his part of the distinction existing between the law of slander and of libel, he has pleaded in defense of those utterances that they were only spoken words, uttered without either previous writing or knowledge of subsequent publication. I refer to them now only as giving an insight into the manner of man who subsequently delivered the carefully prepared address at Edinburgh; for if ever it be true, it is true of extemporaneous utterances, that "out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh."

It was in his Boston speech that he said:

> The President stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way, and men who ought to have that way frequently obstructed. And I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States.

At last we know the motive prompting Mr. Bayard's long-existing ambition to become President. To the diseased brain of this disinterested patriot the violence of the American people and their need to be governed by a real man was manifest, and for many years he continued to offer himself a perpetual and willing sacrifice. Until the discovery of his less accomplished prototype of self-esteem, the office of President—

> He long had sought
> And mourned because he found it not.

[Laughter.]

He mourned until the development of time offered him consolation sweet in the shape of a Cabinet office and a foreign mission. In the bestower of these welcome gifts he sees only a haloed object for perpetual adoration. In the people who had failed to appreciate his Presidential qualifications his disordered imagination observes only "false standards," "blunted consciences," and "corruption in public life." Such are the imputations contained in the Edinburgh address. Now mark the language for which the Georgia citizen was found guilty and subjected to imprisonment:

> Notice.—Credible information being given me that R. M. Goodwin is about selling a negro, or negroes, under a certain deed obtained by him from my mother, Mrs. Julia Scarborough, I hereby notify and warn all persons from purchasing or in any manner incumbering the same, as the said deed is illegal, from causes known to Mr. Goodwin, from papers on record and in his and my possession.

Compare that language against a citizen of Georgia with the infamous imputations against the American people contained in the Edinburgh address; and I quote from Bayard's own confession:

> In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection," which I believe has done more to * * * corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind * * * and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble, than any other single cause * * * and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor.

Although it may require legal training to understand legal definitions, the mind of any layman can easily appreciate how mild are the utterances for which the Georgia defendant suffered imprisonment compared with the monstrous imputations contained in the Edinburgh address.

Had such language been used by an English ambassador against the English people, without his immediate recall, a popular uprising would have driven a prime minister from power.

The majority resolutions contain barely a hint of the real offense. I have spoken of partisanship. The accusation can be applied to either report with almost equal truth. The minority have observed approvingly, and the majority with disapproval, an attack against protection, and in the case of either they have failed to see beyond the utterances of criminal libel. The majority resolutions, therefore, criticise what they call an attack against a portion of the American people. Sir, the ambassador attacked the whole American people when he charged "corruption in public life" and a "blunted public conscience" "sapped by schemes of corrupting favor." What, in Mr. Bayard's opinion, happened to be the cause of the humiliating conditions he thus charged sinks into insignificance beside the infamous charge itself.

It may be true, as has been stated by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that charges equally severe against public life have been made by people in this country, but, be it said, to the everlasting shame of the polluted minds who see through such spectacles, whether the offenders be of low degree or high, occupants of thatched cottages or the mansion at the other end of the Avenue. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I thank God that I was reared and educated in the city of Washington, where I was thrown among public men, and I thank God that that education has taught me that the corrupt man in public life is the exception. Accursed be such a man, for his one act casts a blot upon the fair name of the American Republic. But thrice accursed be those whose tongues of calumny have a much greater tendency to destroy public confidence, high ideals, and patriotism than the corrupt act itself which these libelers so foully exaggerate. They are the men who make undesirable citizens. They should be sent abroad; but not as ambassadors. They should be deported. We should reserve for our ambassadors men whose minds are so constituted that if needs be they must speak in public, they will emulate the example of that patriotic American admiral, who when called upon to respond to the toast of his country said:

My country, always right; but right or wrong, my country.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolutions. Such action by this House is unwarranted and unprecedented. Our ambassadors are under the direction and control of the executive branch of the Government, and the only possible purpose of this proposed action by Congress is to detract from the dignity and usefulness of a very distinguished American, who holds an important position in our foreign service. If we establish the principle of shadowing our public men and catching up and distorting every careless expression, a system would be inaugurated which I am confident men of good taste would not approve. It is evident to me that the citation of Mr. Bayard's speech at Edinburgh has a special object.

This attack upon our ambassador to Great Britain comes from Massachusetts—a State that believes in protection for protection's sake; a State which believes in a system by which the great mass of the people are subjected to onerous burdens for the purpose of enriching the manufacturers of that State.

I recollect in the Forty-seventh Congress, when the tariff bill of 1883 was up for discussion, a leading Congressman from that State announced the Massachusetts demands upon that question. The Democratic minority were insisting upon fixing the tariff so that some revenue could be derived from it, but Mr. Russell of Massachusetts said no.

There is no protection in a revenue tariff—that is, to an American manufacturer; for if a revenue is to be derived from an imported article it must be imported, which certainly involves its manufacture elsewhere, and the rate of duty must be so fixed as to invite its importation. Therefore a tariff can not be adjusted on a single article to serve the double purpose of revenue and protection. It must be either at a point to check importation and thus protect, or it must be at a point low enough to admit importation and thus produce a revenue. That is, when fixed at a revenue point it ceases to protect, and when fixed at a protective point it ceases to yield a revenue.

This is the Massachusetts doctrine, and it is not surprising that Massachusetts men should denounce anyone who opposes doctrines of this character.

Ambassador Bayard has been a distinguished figure in American politics for more than a third of a century. He had seen the evil of legislation of this unconstitutional character, he had seen trusts created, he had seen our exports dwindle and the great producers of our country suffer from the want of markets, and the consequent falling price of their products. With these thoughts in his mind, on November 7, 1895, Mr. Bayard said:

In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection," which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause. * * *

It (the said policy of protection) has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes whose support is thereby attracted. Thus it has done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen.

I most emphatically indorse every syllable of these expressions; especially do I indorse his statement that the Republican policy of protection "tends to our commercial isolation."

The Democratic party contends that a country like ours, with but 4 per cent of the world's population, and producing as we do 80 per cent of the cotton and corn of the world and an average of 40 per cent of those other great staples, wheat, coal, iron ore, pig iron, finished iron, and steel, must have the markets of the world open for the sale of the products of American labor.

During the consideration of the bill upon which Mr. Russell made the speech from which I have quoted, the distinguished champion of protection, Mr. McKinley, made a number of speeches, especially devoting himself to increasing the tariff tax upon iron cotton ties from 35 per cent to 102 per cent, he and his colleagues insisting that unless this was done it would be impossible to manufacture cotton ties in the United States; and they repeated their threadbare threat that when the manufacturers of cotton ties in the United States had become bankrupted for want of sufficient protection the European manufacturers would double or possibly treble their price upon those articles.

We, on the contrary, contended that the high-protection system invited retaliatory tariff and cut us off from foreign markets which otherwise would become large purchasers of the products of our farms and factories. Mr. McKinley claimed to be specially informed on this question of cotton ties, because the largest factory of iron ties in the United States was located at Youngstown, in his district. He succeeded in getting the tariff raised to 102 per cent, and from March 3, 1883, to August 24, 1894, his Youngstown friends were enabled to compel the growers of cotton to pay them double price for their iron ties.

Of course there was no export demand and many of the factories had to be closed and workmen turned out of employment.

When the Democrats got in power and we enacted the Wilson bill, which placed cotton ties upon the free list, immediately every benefit claimed by Democrats was more than fulfilled. Instead of our being flooded with iron ties from foreign countries, the demand for iron ties came from all parts of the world. I hold in my hand the Cleveland World of March 18, 1896, edited by the very high priest of protection, the Hon. Robert P. Porter, late Superintendent of the Census of the United States. This paper tells us that the Youngstown Iron and Steel Company is now engaged in filling an immense order from Bombay, India, for cotton ties. The dispatch says:

An immense amount of cotton ties have already been shipped, but this will form but a small part of the order.

I send the paper to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read the part I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"MADE IN THE UNITED STATES"—AN IMMENSE ORDER FOR IRON BEING SHIPPED FROM YOUNGSTOWN TO BOMBAY.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, March 17.

The Union Iron and Steel Company is running on one of the largest orders of finished iron ever shipped from this valley. The order is from Bombay, India, and shipments have already been begun. An immense amount of cotton ties have already been shipped, but this will form but a small part of the order. Every package sent out will be marked, "Made in the United States."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, that is one of the beneficial effects of the Wilson bill principle of letting down the bars and opening the markets of the world to the products of American industry. In the face of false prophecies made by protectionists we see that with free trade in iron cotton ties we are supplying the entire world; and Youngstown, Ohio, is one of the largest beneficiaries of the Democratic tariff which we enacted on August 24, 1894. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. But the principle of Democratic opposition to protective tariff has not expired, and will never expire. It is right and it is eternal. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I yield twenty-two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON].

Mr. HUTCHESON. I hope that no man will misunderstand my views in regard to the propriety of the utterances of the Hon. Thomas F. Bayard embraced in his addresses and now the subject of animadversion before this House. I should do injustice to myself, Mr. Speaker, if I did not admit, as an American citizen that those utterances were ill-timed and ill-advised. I will, Mr. Speaker, if the question shall be so divided as to permit of its being done, vote for so much of the resolution as does not embrace the name of the distinguished representative or this country, but proclaims (as a correct principle, in my opinion) that no ambassador should so speak of his country while accredited to a foreign nation.

But beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I do not go with the gentlemen who have reported this resolution. I do not go because it is a brutal declaration and a mere brutum fulmen against an honorable citizen concerning words which I do not believe he intended as an insult to the people of this country. I believe that he did not contemplate that it would be the offense in the nostrils of the protectionists which it has been. He overlooked the fact that you stand to protection as we stood to slavery before the war. It is consecrated in your minds, and you permit no man to assail the principle under which you live and move and fry the fat out of the public without sensitive resentment.

I want to congratulate this House, Mr. Speaker, that in the presentation of this question there has been that fairness and statesmanlike consideration for every section and every man and every party in this House, except one gentleman to whom I shall allude, and I hope he will be in his seat before I conclude my remarks. I allude to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

But for the present let me address myself to the magnificent young orator from Iowa [Mr. COUSINS]. I hail him, I greet him, I congratulate him. He walks the earth and strews the pathway with orient pearls, and puts upon each blade of grass a gem, and then takes the crown of flowers from all the gardens and places it upon the brow of Protection. Sirs, I could not create the fascinating bouquets, but I propose to show that they are exotic plants to the policy of protection, and that he has placed upon its brow and claims for that policy what belongs to the genius and growth of this country, irresistible under any policy and inextinguishable even by protection. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman stood upon the banks of the Potomac and gathered the flowers of the speech from that distinguished gentleman, Wendell Phillips, than whom no man possessed them in richer profusion, he appropriated the fair flowers that belonged to the spirit of Freedom and put them upon the base brow of Protection, because Protection is the goddess at whose shrine he worships. Let me repeat it:

As long as there is a slave within our borders there can be no union.

Does the gentleman say as long as there is free trade in this land there can be no union? Sir, whatever taxes the toil of one man for the benefit of another is slavery, and that is the avowed office of protection.

Let me tell the gentleman that the same hand which struck down slavery in the South converted this nation of 70,000,000 people to the slavery of protection. The same hand that manumitted the freedman of the South transmitted to him none of the benefits of protection, I challenge you to show in the institutions of the North to-day a single ex-slave, a single colored man, working at the machinery of protected industries. They are rejected by the very institutions which you have constructed. In the fields of industry north of Mason and Dixon's line where is there to-day a place where they could earn their daily bread? I invoke this same prophecy for protection, and, though it may be long delayed, its doom is certain.

But the gentleman passes on from the proposition of liberty to the splendid scenery at Chicago. Let us quote:

I walked up and down the aisles of that manufacturer's building and I saw the handiwork—

Of what? Of America?

I saw the handiwork of mankind—of Jew and Gentile, of Oriental, of Pagan, and of Christian—lying side by side with that of our own American artisans, and I thought to myself, "This is enough to fulfill the prophecy—the genius of liberty robed in light."

Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman recognize in that picture that alone in an exhibition, separate and apart from the markets of this country, can those splendid things which so electrified him be shown upon the American continent—that he permits us to have our appetites whetted, and still the luxuries are denied to our stomachs? It is protection which denies the enjoyment of the luxury which so fascinates his eye, and yet he glories in the beauties he can not enjoy and worships the tyrant which disappoints his palate.

Like the witches, it makes the promise to the ear and breaks it to the hope. We will gather the luxuries of the East and the West, and of the world, and place them before you to show you what its capacities are, and after we have placed them in your sight we will place them beyond your reach by a mountain wall of protection. Was that liberty? Is that its symbol? Sir, if you had made a holiday occasion and brought the negro into that exhibition unshackled of his chains and then driven him back into slavery, would that have been a fulfillment of the splendid inspiration of Wendell Phillips? And does not the protection which you proclaim as far destroy the success of the beautiful picture as that which is illustrated by the proposition that you shall on a gala day lead the negro into the light of liberty and instantly expel him from its enjoyment?

But, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman, in commenting on this floor upon the first section of the speech of Mr. Bayard, proclaimed Mr. Cleveland "a great man, a leader among men," I want to say that he furnished in confirmation the strongest proof of the truth of all that Mr. Bayard said concerning the power of protection when he painted him and admitted him to be great, but, pausing, said: "But there are other great men in this country besides the President," and then, with happy illustration, portrayed the time when that great man was bowed down in defeat in the passage of the tariff bill in the other House. He who had been able to conquer on all other things, measured his arm with all other forces, encountered protection in the Senate, and protection was more powerful than Grover Cleveland. The only power in this country to which he has surrendered, according to the language of the gentleman; and the illustration of his argument was that protection, panoplied and supported by every member of the Republican party and by a faction of the Democratic party in the Senate of the United States, overcame him.

But, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman says that the prosperity of this country has been brought about by protection, I propose to reflect its absurdity and to show that it was not "protection," but that it was "war." If the argument of the gentleman is correct, that that which brings prosperity should have its brow crowned with rich glory, then, sir, the brow of War should be crowned with praise and be acclaimed the great civilizer and great developer of this country. I appeal to the census of this country to show that from 1860 to 1870 the wealth of Maine increased 200 per cent more than it did at any other time in its history. From 1860 to 1870 Massachusetts, from which the gentleman hails, increased three times as much as it ever did in the history of this country, and Iowa, which in 1860 had a population of a little over 600,000, increased to 1,200,000. It was this war, and the young gentleman should not attribute the glories and achievements of this country to protection, but to the war of the rebellion, and should crown grim-visaged War with all the plaudits for our growth and prosperity in the last third of a century. Take the bays from the brow of Peace and place the palm on grim-visaged War.

But, Mr. Speaker, while all the gentlemen save the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] have given us a dignified discussion of this subject, and a patriotic discussion, that gentleman, coming from the sweet State of Massachusetts, hailing, as I find, from Melrose—a beautiful name, not only a rose but a honey rose—I am led to inquire, Mr. Speaker, what it is in that atmosphere which so saturates a man with bitterness that it oozes out of his skin as he breathes and drops from his lips like burning lava when he speaks? What is it, Mr. Speaker, that imbues HENRY CABOT LODGE, from the same district, the author of the force bill? What is it, Mr. Speaker, that makes the gentleman from Melrose, the sweet-scented and geranium-flavored Melrose—what is it, Mr. Speaker, that makes him the exponent of all that is to protect the flag and stand eternal guard for the union of this country?

Sir, on his first introduction he walked down the aisle of this House with articles of impeachment against the distinguished gentleman from Delaware. His second introduction to this House was an article of impeachment, or a call for taking down the words of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] as treasonable, and the last article that we hear from Melrose is an impeachment of Thomas F. Bayard because he was a traitor to his country in 1861. Until we reach the district of Melrose every speaker calls him gentleman and patriot; but when you reach sweet Melrose, where the birds twitter in the trees and each morning the angels of life and of light sing their matin songs beneath the windows of the soul, that gentleman assails him for kind words uttered for the South thirty-five years ago. The gentleman from Iowa said we needed no declaration that Cleveland did not eat children. Sir, we may not need a declaration that Cleveland did not eat children; but I would like to have the gentleman stand up here and testify that the people of Melrose do not eat children.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that whatever should have been said upon this occasion should have been confined to the merits of Mr. Bayard's utterances. We feel that no man should have gone into the grave of the Confederacy to visit upon us insult. The South staked her fortunes and her institutions on the arbitrament of the sword, and after a struggle which immortalized valor and eclipsed the achievements of twenty centuries she went down, gigantic in her fall. After that fall, Mr. Speaker, she claimed nothing except the recognition of the rights which were accorded her upon the battlefield. With our legions but a handful, and our flag but a shred, we fought to the finish, and when the immortal Lee surrendered to the magnificent Grant he accepted his sword, and over that acceptance he said, "Let there be peace," and it was peace. In that grave we buried the cause of rebellion, and put the seal of death upon it, and no man who breaks that seal does anything but a sacrilegious act to the dishonor of our Lee, whom we love.

Sir, we came back to you as to a union between man and wife. We had sought divorce, but you forced us back into the Union.

Let it be a Union of love. I had rather be the Bluebeard who would destroy wife after wife, inch by inch, and drop by drop of blood, than that man who would corral a dozen wives into his embraces and then insult them while he enjoyed them. This Union, Mr. Speaker, should be a Union of equal States, of equal rights. While we placed upon the arbitrament of the sword the destinies of our country, the policies of the South, we reserved to ourselves our individual rights, our individual sensibilities and manhood, and no man has the right to, and no brave man will, here transgress them. I desire to quote to this House an utterance of the lamented Garfield. He said:

> After the storm of battle were heard the sweet, calm words of peace uttered by the conquering nation, saying to the conquered foe that lay prostrate at its feet: "This is our only revenge, that you join us in lifting to the serene firmament of the Constitution, to shine with us like stars forever and ever, the immortal principles of truth and justice that all men, white and black, shall be free and stand equal before the law."

That invitation we accepted, and we are here to-day. Our stars are in your flag, our States are in your Union. We are here as a brotherhood, entitled to your respect. Nay more, Mr. Speaker, when we went from the battlefield to our homes, we found desolation where there had been plenty, we found toil where there had been theretofore leisure. We took up the South, put our arms around our dead and buried them, put our arms around our wounded and have supported them, and, carrying this heavy load up the hill, we have planted the star of prosperity over all those States which were bleached with the bones and ran with the blood of her sons. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Sirs, if the great humiliation of our fall does not engender some divine radiance, if our sorrows and our losses do not excite some pity, and if they can not relax a ghoulish malevolence, let us at least have our memories, which are made sacred by sorrow and immortal by defeat, respected by silence. The brave man does not strike the fallen foe or recur to the memories of unsuccessful conflict. Let us, oblivious of past differences and considerate of each other's sensibilities, stand like brothers in this country and in this House, ready to do or die in making it the one great nation before which all the world must surrender their supremacy.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad to vote for the second of these resolutions, with a verbal amendment which I hope will be made. If I can vote upon that resolution singly and separately, I shall be glad to do so, without attempting to controvert any thing which has been said with reference to the first resolution, for I admit the truth of every word that has been uttered in this House concerning Mr. Bayard and the sentiment expressed in that resolution. But I think I shall have to vote against the first resolution, for the following reasons:

First, I have that amount of State pride which will lead me to vote against the resolution. I respect Mr. Bayard as a man of force, of distinction, and occupying a high position not only before the people of his native State (which is my State), but of the country. I will confess to you that I believe, and I think I know, that Mr. Bayard is a born aristocrat, posing as a democrat [laughter]; that he has in him feudal instincts, is not in touch with the people, and presents in his personality the unaccountable paradox of the union of the lord with the yeoman. But, at the same time, it might be admitted that these very qualities would give him greater credit at the British court than a man of a different cast might have, and if he can do us good there I am willing that he should, glad that he should. For, Mr. Speaker, I know that royalty is very jealous of its prerogatives. Royalty does not like republicanism, and if there is any place on God's earth to which the peculiar characteristics and qualities of our distinguished ambassador are specially suitable it is the place that he occupies at the present time. [Laughter.]

Second, I shall vote, I think, against the first resolution because our action in adopting that resolution must necessarily appear to be, even if should not be, a partisan movement; and I deprecate the idea of partisan action on a question of this kind going out before the world. If we can not be unanimous, or practically unanimous, in the vote we take here, it is very questionable in my mind whether or not it will do the country any good or our party any good to adopt the resolution.

Third, the passage of the first resolution, the putting on record of censure against our ambassador, might have a tendency to weaken and neutralize his influence in the position that he occupies to-day. I do not want to do that.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Let him come home, then.

Mr. WILLIS. It is the President's business to bring him home; and if you were President no doubt you would do it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Certainly I would.

Mr. WILLIS. And if I were President I surely would do it. But the discussion which has been had, and which has really "boxed the compass" of political topics on the part of those gentlemen who have discussed the subject, especially on the other side and I do not know but also on my own side of the House, has attracted my attention to some special features with reference to this matter. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], whom I do not now see in his seat, and who was very liberal, if not lavish, in his reference to Scripture, gave us yesterday a very adroit interpretation and application of certain Scripture passages, to which I wish briefly to refer. I think his argument was especially weak because of false interpretation and false application. Let us look at it for a single moment. He quoted the passage, "And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." Now, without saying that on that very figurative passage there have been various renderings and various views, so that a great many persons really do not know what it means—without referring to that, let us take the gentleman's own interpretation of it and let us ask him, Did he mean by his application to tell us that when Mr. Bayard used the word "violent" in his speech in England he intended to say that the American people were on a rush for the kingdom of heaven and that Mr. Cleveland was the only man strong enough to stand at the gate and keep them back? [Laughter.]

As the gentleman was so very free in his Scripture references, I should like to quote a passage or two of Scripture to him. I agree with everything he said with reference to the ability and the fame of Mr. Bayard. I am willing that a man shall exalt him to the seventh heaven. I am willing he should say he is really a great man, though I will say parenthetically just at this point that I do not accept the common definition of greatness that the world seems sometimes to adopt. I do not believe that a man is necessarily a great man because he has a great brain. To make a man great you must give him a great heart, a great soul, a soul in touch with the human race, with the great mass of the people; a soul that is full of sympathy, full of humanity, full of fraternity, full of love. [Applause.] A man may have the genius of Lucifer and be a devil still. He may have the intuitions and splendid intellectuality of an archangel, and yet look through a keyhole and whistle through a quill. [Laughter.]

I say I will agree with everything that the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] have said with reference to the eminence and ability of Mr. Bayard; and when you have said it all, you but make more emphatic that remarkable passage from the wise man recorded in the Scriptures, which reads thus:

> Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savor; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor.

And the passage has an unfortunate application in the present case. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Kentucky, after he got through with his chapter of panegyrics on our ambassador, reminded us (an astonishing revelation) that the American people are behind Mr. Bayard and that there is great danger of his being elected President of the United States if we should happen to censure him. That was about the drift of the gentleman's argument from the analogies and references he made. I think, however, that the distinguished gentlemen from Kentucky has got his dramatis personæ somewhat transposed. Instead of the American people being back of the ambassador, the ambassador is back of the American people, and a good ways back—so far that he will never catch up. [Laughter.] It reminds me of a little story told of a horse race down here at Baltimore. Three or four splendid nags were brought out, and then one that was of inferior grade but carrying a high head and a graceful tail. An old darky standing by said: "Dat's de horse; look at him. Dat's my horse; look at him." When the race came off the darky's favorite horse was distanced, but the darky, never discouraged, never hopeless, said: "Didn't I tell you so? Look at dat horse; he's drivin' everything afore him." [Laughter.] Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky and to the gentleman from Virginia that on this question of protection, on this question which has stirred the hearts of the American people for the last three, four, or five years, the Democratic party, the Democratic Administration, the Democratic ambassador, are driving everything before them.

But if I had time I would rather speak upon the congeners and correlatives of these resolutions than upon the resolutions themselves. We may trust every age to produce its modicum of sycophants and simpletons, egotists and despots; and this age is not behind the record. There are men holding subordinate places in the Government of the United States to-day, men sitting with their feet on the mantelpiece, with cigars in their mouths, who are as difficult of access as the Mikado of Japan. [Laughter.] They have got the "big head," and got it bad. [Renewed laughter.] They belong, probably, to the class who believe everything foreign is good. They belong to that large class who think that everything that comes from abroad is better than anything that is American; who ape foreign manners and adopt foreign politics; who contract foreign marriages, praise foreign institutions, and cultivate foreign style and foreign fashions, and who leave here every vacation time and go to Europe to apologize for the battle of Bunker Hill. [Great laughter and applause.] These are the people who play the harlequin at the feet of royalty and would be proud to eat dirt if they could eat it off a royal platter; who think that an aristocratic snob, a gouty, leprous, half idiotic, immoral, licentious lordling, the degenerate offspring of a spurious ancestry, the rotten product of a rotten and effete system, is better than the sun-browned American farmer, with his bronzed cheeks painted with pigments of the sky, his nerves and muscles as strong as Hercules's, his every sinew hardened by the reaction of honest toil, his blood as pure as the waters of Castalia, as he goes to his morning toil with feet as winged as Mercury's, brushing the dews from the grass by the hedgerows on a June morning, breathing the ozone of God and feeling himself a man. [Applause.]

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, there is but one standard in which the difference can be marked in the social standing of the human family, and I wish to draw that standard here, before the young men of this House, who I trust will be in it, its pride and glory, perhaps long years after many of us who are older have gone to the other land. There is just one standard of distinction, appropriately speaking, between men in this world, and that is greater knowledge and better morals. [Applause.] To know more and do better. Everything else is subordinate to that. I do not care to go beyond that. Beyond that Mat Pryor's epitaph is good enough for me:

Here lie the bones of Mat Pryor,
Descended from Adam and Eve;
If anyone can rank higher,
I'se willing to give him leave.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, God Almighty in his providence did three things for the human family. One was to give them a residence. Through the phases and changes of the geological eras He brought this grand old world to its present state of perfection—through the great Carboniferous era, through the Glacial period, and through all of the other periods, until the rains came and the sun topped the mountain ridges and the streams cleft the valleys and the continents and islands arose from the surrounding seas as the fields of the Lord. And then He has done another thing. He has furnished them with a religion, which, through ethnical restrictions and limitations, has come to be universal, so that the golden rule is the touchstone of excellence and religious eminence and religious glory in the world. And lastly, He has furnished them a Government which is the product of principles that have lain and struggled in human minds since men began to sigh for liberty. It is in the ideal, epitomized, magnificent Republic of which you and I are citizens, the complement of the altitude of the best civilization of the world. [Applause.]

And yet, in spite of the principles which it illustrates and sets forth, which have been sighed for from high places and low places, which men have struggled for through thousands of years and fought for through the ages and centuries, which have been cried out for by the oppressed and the helpless from the desert places—I say in spite of all this there are those who walk the earth to-day and call themselves men who do not know a good thing when they see it. They walk and strut the rostrum of life as they look down upon their better fellows and say, "I am Sir Oracle, and when I speak let no dog bark." [Laughter.] Sir, when the Prætorian guard undertook the functions of king making the Roman Empire began to totter. They assassinated Pertinax and sold the crown to Julianus. Soon the Parthians were thundering at their gates. Confusion succeeded treason and ruin finally came to the proud mistress of the world.

When a man can not find anything good in the United States and has to go over to England or some other foreign country for it, he is bartering the crown. When he wants to adopt foreign manners and marry his daughter to a foreign snob, he is bartering the crown. When an American woman, for the sake of an empty name, possessed of vast fortune, as she may be, can not find an American with brains and heart and soul and life good enough for her, but must go over to the other side and find somebody who goes crazy over the divine rights of kings and knows nothing about the divine rights of people, that has conniptions and spasms over the guinea's stamp and knows nothing about the guinea's gold, she is bartering the American crown. [Applause.]

I protest against the bartering of the crown by men born on this free soil. To-day we have no controversy, my brethren, whether we live in the North or in the South, as to our citizenship. Let us be true to it. There is a better and brighter time coming. It is a day of intense and glorious light, and America is pledged for its coming and for its existence. When it comes liberty's throne will be erected on every mountain top and in every valley, and fraternity and equality will be the heritage of nations. [Applause.]

I shall vote for the second resolution and reject the first.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains to the negative side?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-nine minutes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I yield that time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I share with great pride in the admiration which the gentleman who has just spoken entertains for the "sun-browned American citizen." My contention to-day will be not for the feudalism of protection with its merciless exactions, but for that great principle which was chosen as the theme at Edinburgh on the 7th of November last, "Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence." It was the sentiment at once of the chevalier and of the yeoman. And it is to defend against the assaults of malicious enemies in this country the distinguished author of that noble sentiment of freedom that I enter this debate.

I stand to-day, Mr. Speaker, in the presence of a triumphant party on the other side. They have brought to this House almost an unprecedented majority. And they have great duties and responsibilities. They have great demands on their capacity for government. They are on trial as to their ability to originate great measures of relief which shall command public confidence. To mitigate the prevailing stringency they have devised more taxation, and to restore confidence they have invented more burdens. Fortunately for the sun-browned citizen that bill has failed in another place. As to the disorders in the Treasury, they formulated another emergency measure during the holidays, which has now disappeared from view. The "endless chain" may still operate upon the gold reserve. Our wretched banking laws are as wretched as ever, with no prospect of amendment.

This great and triumphant party turns helplessly away from these tremendous interests, and with great energy and unanimity trains all its artillery upon an individual member of the defeated party to which I belong. What an exploit in politics is that. In order to do nothing else, they can talk eloquently about the sufferings of Christians in Armenia, and about the incomprehensible condition of Cuba, and over the mighty significance of the Monroe doctrine; and now still further to conceal their helplessness in the field of their real tasks and duties, they have made this great occasion and a debate of three days over an alleged discourtesy of Mr. Bayard. He did not violate any statute nor any known regulation of the department to which he is responsible. He transcended the canons of good taste forsooth. The victorious Republican party, in this Presidential year, marches against an individual for alleged bad taste in solid phalanx, and like an army with banners.

Allow me nevertheless, sir, to pause here and say that about a matter of taste there can be no dispute. If the gentleman from Iowa had not so stigmatized the idiom I would have given it in terse Latin —De gustibus non est disputandum.

Mr. Speaker, the question here is not merely whether Mr. Bayard committed an indiscretion or violated good taste; it is rather whether it is right or proper or in good taste for the House of Representatives to visit its censure and condemnation upon this great American. I propose to show, sir, that he has done nothing wrong; and before I enter into that discussion I want to return my thanks to my good friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] for his eloquent tribute to this distinguished defender of the Constitution and of its great bulwarks of liberty. And, sir, may my right hand forget its cunning if I ever raise it against the man who stood in the very front of the phalanx of freedom when my section had no defenders upon the floor of Congress. Pardon me if I confess my admiration is not unmixed with gratitude.

The party to which I belong has no great army of mercenaries. There are none of those who have put up for our use the sinews of war. There are none to whom we have given special bounties; there are none to whom we have given booty and plunder, and there are none on whom we can draw; no special classes that have grown fat by policies that we have enacted and out of whom we can extract the grease—I hesitate to put it in the vulgar vernacular of the Republican hustings. [Laughter.]

But it is not so with our adversaries. They have bestowed largesses and donatives upon special interests for a generation, and the army of protection—the Pretorian Guard of the tariff—is about to dispose of the Presidential purple. Mr. Bayard offended these gentlemen at Edinburgh by speaking of the tendency of protection to a mercenary scramble, as averred in the resolutions. If the indictment is true, any man ought to be allowed to proclaim it on the house top and anywhere in the world. The proof is already furnished. Out of the mouths of his assailants comes the demonstration of the truth of this great indictment. The Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. CHANDLER, a gentleman well known for his devotion to the Republican party, has testified with great emphasis and detail, and after deliberation reiterated it. His testimony has already been sufficiently and effectively presented in this debate. I now cite additional evidence from the New York

Evening Post of yesterday, leaving out names, because I dislike personal politics:

Mr. ——, when questioned as to the reports that he had solicited subscriptions from manufacturing establishments in the interest of ——, replied that "it was nobody's business." The Iowa State Register, ——'s organ, takes issue with this. "It is in the highest sense the public's business," it says; "the people have a right to know, and to demand to know, just what moneys are being used to promote the Presidential nominations. We are afraid that Mr. —— is not altogether blameless, or he would not have used such language. If he had been wholly blameless he would have availed himself of the opportunity to deny in toto the ugly charges which have been made against him in the East as well as by Mr. —— in Illinois."

The names that I have suppressed in this statement are the names of distinguished men.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOPKINS). Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I do not; my time is too limited, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman from Ohio has had his time, and in that time my good friend, while he stood over the grave of Robert Schenck and defended him against imputation, was carefully silent as to these current imputations upon the party of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And so, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bayard's proposition and the demonstration of its truth are almost coincident. And it ought to be as the lightning, and then the thunder.

Let me remind gentlemen that we on this side, during the last Congress, offended protected interests by abating somewhat their power to tax, and that these same people are tempted on by the prospect and promise of an increase of their power to tax. Remembering that we on this side have as our allies only unpurchased freemen, I pause and ask my comrades here, if in the face of the inspiring struggle before us, are we to divide and go to pieces on temporary and transient issues when the great issue of freedom lies before us in the immediate future. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, when these things are charged and said here at home they meet no denial; they meet no contradiction; no investigation is demanded; there is no challenge given to it; but if somebody on the other side of the ocean announces or demonstrates the vicious and corrupt tendencies of protection, this insolent power says to him, no matter how distinguished, "Silence, sir."

Mr. Speaker, so far from there having been any impropriety in the utterances at Edinburgh, the question was one rising high above all mere matters of taste, of courtesy, or of diplomatic propriety. It was a matter about which a patriot might anywhere speak as with a trumpet. It was an occasion on which he might speak, to be heard by all mankind, against the degradation and slavery and corruption of the system which he denounced. Sir, if I had it in my power, in face of the peril that confronts us and the country, denounced even by those who are quarreling about their rivalries and the preliminary division of the spoils—I say, sir, if I had my way I would put in every honest hand a whip to scourge this demon of protection naked through the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As the shadow of this great peril gathers around us and its gloom falls on the Capitol, I would kindle in that dome a light as a warning to my countrymen which should be as—

Had kindled on Ben Vorlich's head.

Another speech has been mentioned in these resolutions. It is said that on some occasion our ambassador indicted his countrymen as "violent and hot tempered." This latter occasion for impeachment was added to the resolution by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], and yesterday, if I did not misunderstand him, he deprecated any condemnation on account of that incident. And to find another pretext for denunciation, that gentleman unearthed the well-known Dover speech of Bayard. That speech was made at a time when courage in civil life was as much required and of as high degree as that which animated men on the battlefield; but that speech was one of the bravest! But it belongs to a forgotten era; and since those who were our late enemies in civil war met with us around the base of a monument dedicated to the Confederate dead in the city of Chicago I have felt my heart warm anew to the Union. But, sir, let me not be diverted from what was said at the Boston grammar school in England.

Mr. Bayard had gone to that school as an invited guest, and great honor was done to him as the American ambassador. After two or three other speeches on that day, the health of the President of the United States was proposed as a toast, and he, according to custom, was called upon to respond. Certain words were uttered by him on that occasion of which a newspaper has given us the report to which reference has been made. We know not whether it is a literal and accurate report, but I enter no plea of that kind at this time. Take every word there uttered and embodied in this preamble as a basis for these resolutions, and at last you are bound to conclude that you have fired a great gun at nothing. [Laughter.] The whole Republican party is marching pell-mell against the statement that the American President is "a strong man" and that he is "governing," if you please, a people sometimes "violent."

Now, let me tell the House what was said of this same President, not by a Democratic ambassador, but by one who had been a Republican ambassador at the Court of St. James. I have here an address made by James Russell Lowell at the Harvard anniversary, at which Mr. Cleveland himself was a guest, and I will read to you what Mr. Lowell said of the President on that occasion. I do not know whether James Russell Lowell was a yeoman or a cavalier, a Roundhead or a Puritan. It makes no difference to me. He was one of the most delightful and scholarly authors of New England and one of the most distinguished Republicans of that party, and at that Harvard anniversary, speaking of President Cleveland, he said:

You all know that I can mean only the President of our Republic. His presence is a signal honor to us all, and to us all I may say a personal gratification. We have no politics here, but the sons of Harvard all belong to the party which admires courage, strength of purpose, and fidelity to duty, and which respects, wherever he may be found, the

Civium ardor prava jubentium.

Now, that is giving, in the elegant Latin of Horace, the very same idea in more intense form which Mr. Bayard expressed at Boston. But did anybody offer to impeach Mr. Lowell for that utterance? Was there any condemnation of that distinguished and scholarly man? Mr. Bayard was at a grammar school where this eloquent phrase of Horace mingled in the air and was understood by all.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to add—and I add it with great pleasure—what Mr. Lowell further said of the same gentleman, the President of the United States:

He has left the helm of state to be with us here, and so long as it is intrusted to his hands we are sure that should the storm come he will say with Seneca's Pilot, "O Neptune, you may save me if you will; you may sink me if you will; but whatever happen, I shall keep my rudder true."

[Loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS.]

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, in common with many who have spoken on this subject, I have to say that as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I regret that it has been necessary to take action upon this subject. That committee, acting with deliberation, called upon the President of the United States, first, to inform the House as to the accuracy of the quotations from Mr. Bayard's speeches which had been published in this country, and, second, whether any action had been taken by the Executive upon the subject. The reply came, practically substantiating the correctness of the quotations and stating that no action had been taken by the Executive.

It was expected that a President who was so prompt to act in the case of Sir Sackville West, whose offense was that he wrote to a fellow-countryman in California, an adopted citizen of the United States, a letter regarding an election then pending in the United States and commenting on conditions of domestic politics—that a President who was so prompt to give that representative of a foreign power his passports for a breach of diplomatic decorum, although the allusions in that letter to himself, to his policy, and to his party, were complimentary in the highest degree, would be prompt to respond by taking appropriate action with reference to the representative of this country bearing a like mission to England, representing the dignity and honor of his country there, and indulging in language of insult and reprobation regarding domestic policies of his own country, whether national or partisan, even though he lifted the Executive upon a pedestal of dignity and power and strength and contrasted him in most complimentary terms with a people strong and "violent," who needed to be obstructed in the measures which they proposed. We had a right to expect that the President would, by words of disapproval, by words of at least mild reproof, call the attention of Mr. Bayard to the requirements of the diplomatic service and to his breach of diplomatic propriety, and thus do away with the necessity for action by Congress upon this subject. But no such course was taken by the President, and it remains for us to assert the dignity of the nation. I have no question of our power, I have no question of our right, to censure any public servant so unmindful of the proprieties of his distinguished position.

The expressions which are complained of occur in two speeches, one delivered at Edinburgh and one at Boston in England. I shall have little to say with reference to the speech at Edinburgh, though it involved offensive criticism of the existing policy of a great party and what might be termed the national policy of the United States ever since the organization of our Government. I shall refer mainly to the Boston speech, in which the "strength" of the President of the United States was contrasted with the "violence" of the people whom he "governed." I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that there are a great many persons of education, of refinement, in this country who have great admiration for the so-called strength of our President. I shall say nothing whatever in reprobation of his strength of will or his strength of purpose; but I take it that will and determination rightly exercised accomplish good, while will and determination wrongly exercised only make action more indefensible.

Now, it is this last kind of strength which the President of the United States has demonstrated to the country—the strength of *ob*struction, the strength of *de*struction, not the strength of *con*struction. Under his leadership an industrial and financial war has been waged upon the prosperty, the industries, and the energies of this people. He has sought to pull down the wall of protection which the policy of the country had erected for the protection, not only of American labor, but of American capital, for both are alike entitled to protection, and he has also sought to destroy the traditional financial policy of the country and to make gold the only medium of exchange and measure of value. The prostrated industries, the lowered values, the distress of the producers and debtors attest the strength of his obstructive and destructive power, which strength the ambassador to England so eloquently praises.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague does not object to the extension of the gentleman's time, but only to the extension of the time for taking the vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman's time can not be extended without extending the time for taking the vote.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. HITT. Has the other side five minutes remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The other side has about three minutes remaining.

Mr. HITT. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if I could have controlled the matter now under consideration, I would not have brought it to the attention of this House; because I do not think that it is incumbent upon this body to scrutinize the speeches which a representative of this Government may deliver in a foreign country. But, sir, since the question is before us, and must be decided one way or the other, I shall not allow my judgment against bringing it here to influence my vote upon it now that it is here; nor shall I suffer myself to be diverted from the precise question which is before us by a partisan debate upon the tariff question, which is not before us.

To my mind it is perfectly clear that, in view of the position which he occupied, it was improper for Ambassador Bayard to discuss in another country a question which is seriously controverted in this country. That he should have done so, however, was hardly more than an exhibition of bad taste; or at worst, it was not more than a breach of official propriety, and does not deserve the formal censure which is now proposed against him. The overwrought passage in which he grossly exaggerated the degradation of American politics is objectionable, I grant you; but it is not so objectionable as to justify these proceedings, and if it constituted the only basis of these resolutions, I should feel constrained to vote against their adoption—not because I think the language free from criticism, but because I do not think it warrants this kind of criticism.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Boston speech, to my way of thinking, presents a very much more serious question. When a representative of this Government, surrounded by his English friends in a banquet hall, described his own countrymen as "a violent people who need to have their will obstructed," he committed an offense not merely against good taste and diplomatic etiquette but against common sense and sound patriotism. [Applause.] In this remarkable utterance Mr. Bayard shows himself ignorant of the character of our people, and hostile to the theory of our Government. A hundred years of orderly submission to the law repels the unjust charge that Americans are a people of violent disposition. Twice, sir, in our history a President has fallen under an assassin's hand; twice, the electoral college having failed to choose, this House has chosen a President; and once, amidst intense excitement, an extra-constitutional tribunal has declared a President elected. And yet, sir, each crisis was met and passed with a patriotic forbearance that has forever refuted the ancient calumny that free States are turbulent. [Applause.]

The ambassador has been defended with the suggestion that he did not mean what he said, and that his language, taken with what precedes and what follows, is not susceptible of the construction which has been placed upon it. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that I could be satisfied with that explanation, but unfortunately the connection in which the objectionable expression occurs confirms me in my objection to it. Mr. Bayard was extolling the President, and in order to exalt the magistrate he defamed the people. He sought to prove Mr. Cleveland's greatness by the fact that he governs a people who are difficult to govern.

My friend from Virginia yesterday asserted the truth of Mr. Bayard's accusation against our people and attempted to establish it by recalling the riots of the past. Unfortunately it is true that there have been occasional outbreaks; but will my learned friend hold all of the American people responsible for the deeds of violence which have now and then occurred in some isolated community? Suppose, sir, that he should stand before a temperance society in Great Britain and, intending to admit that some of our people are addicted to intemperate drink, should asperse us as a nation of drunkards. Or suppose he were attending the sessions of some benevolent society whose purpose it is to suppress the commission of crime, and, answering for his own constituents, he should be compelled to admit that now and then a murder stains the fair name of Old Virginia; if, then, some member of the association should rise and brand Virginians as a race of murderers, would he think the imputation just?

But, sir, the characterization of our people as violent is not more offensive than the statement that we frequently need to have our will obstructed. That the President should be praised for obstructing the public will is in itself subject to the most severe animadversion. The President, sir, is our servant, not our master, and it is his duty to enforce our decrees. Mr. Speaker, it is the special excellence of this system that within certain constitutional limitations which the people have voluntarily imposed upon their own power, the popular will is supreme and must be obeyed. I do not claim that the people are infallible. I do not say they are always right; for that would be ascribing to them collectively a wisdom which their wisest leaders can never hope to attain. But this I do say: It is infinitely better that the will of the people shall be fully and faithfully executed, even when they are wrong, than that their servants shall be taught the dangerous doctrine that it is a virtue ever to circumvent it. [Applause.] Sir, whoever declares that the American people need to have their will obstructed assails the very foundations of this Government; and the man who will stand before the subjects of a monarchy and stigmatize the citizens of this great Republic as a "violent people" is unworthy to represent this country anywhere or in any capacity. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, without occupying the few minutes remaining with further debate, I will ask that we now proceed to a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, is it competent to have the resolutions voted on separately?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules the question can be divided.

Mr. WILLIS and Mr. DRAPER asked for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the first resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I wish to ask for information whether the vote will be taken on the preamble and the first resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that would be substantially the case, because the resolution refers to the preamble.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The reason I asked the question was because I understood the Speaker to say the question would be on the first resolution. As I now understand, the first question will be on the adoption of the preamble and the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken on the first resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Including the preamble?

The SPEAKER. It is for the House, after the resolution is acted on, to say what it will do with the preamble.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has called attention to a word in the preamble which it would be better to put correctly. It seems to have been printed incorrectly in the report we have from the Secretary of State. We could not take liberties with that. In order to conform to the text as received from the Secretary of State I ask to insert, after the words "have their own way," in the preamble, the words "and men who seek to have that way frequently obstructed." I think that is erroneous; but those are the words that come from the Secretary of State, and, if there be no objection, I ask that that amendment be made in the quotation from the speech.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the preamble, after the words "have their own way," add the words "and men who seek to have that way frequently obstructed."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change will be made. The question is on the first resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said in a public speech delivered in Boston, England, on August 2, 1895, as follows:

"'He (the President of the United States) stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people—men who seek to have their own way, and men who seek to have that way frequently obstructed, and I tell you plainly that it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States;" and

Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, said in a public speech delivered in Edinburgh, Scotland, on November 7, 1895, as follows:

"'In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled 'protection,' which I believe has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon state aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble, than any other single cause. * * *

"'It (the said policy of protection) has unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tends to commercial isolation, dangerously depletes the Treasury, and saps the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes whose support is thereby attracted. Thus it has done so much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen:' " Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, in publicly using the language above quoted has committed an offense against diplomatic propriety and an abuse of the privileges of his exalted position, which should make him the representative of the whole country and not of any political party. Such utterances are wholly inconsistent with that prudent, delicate, and scrupulous reserve which he himself while Secretary of State enjoined upon all diplomatic agents of the United States. In one speech he affronts the great body of his countrymen who believe in the policy of protection. In the other speech he offends all his countrymen who believe that Americans are capable of self-government. Therefore, as the immediate representatives of the American people, and in their name, we condemn and censure the said utterances of Thomas F. Bayard.

Resolved further, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives public speeches by our diplomatic or consular officers abroad which display partisanship or which condemn any political party or party policy or organization of citizens in the United States are in dereliction of the duty of such officers, impair their usefulness as public servants, and diminish the confidence which they should always command at home and abroad.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the first resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 182, nays 72, not voting 101; as follows:

So the first resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. TRACEWELL with Mr. HENDRICK.

Mr. ANDREWS with Mr. MILES.

Mr. MILLIKEN with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. HURLEY with Mr. PATTERSON.

Mr. HARDY with Mr. ELLETT of Virginia.

Mr. FISCHER with Mr. MADDOX.

Mr. LEISENRING with Mr. SHAW.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. MOSES.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE with Mr. LESTER.

Mr. BURTON of Missouri with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. HOOKER with Mr. MCCLELLAN.

Mr. ODELL with Mr. TYLER.

Mr. LEONARD with Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

Mr. PARKER with Mr. COWEN.

For this day:

Mr. BARNEY with Mr. RUSSELL of Georgia.

Mr. WARNER with Mr. HALL.

Mr. KULP with Mr. MINER of New York.

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut with Mr. CLARKE of Alabama.

Mr. GRIFFIN with Mr. MCKINNEY.

Mr. COFFIN with Mr. STRAIT.

Mr. DAYTON with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. FENTON with Mr. BERRY.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio with Mr. BUCK.

Mr. BROMWELL with Mr. CATCHINGS.

For this vote:

Mr. MORSE with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. TOWNE, is absent, but I am authorized to state for him that had he been present, he would have voted "yea."

Mr. DE ARMOND. My colleague, Mr. DOCKERY, is called away by the death of a kinsman. I ask that indefinite leave of absence be granted him.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDRICK. Mr. Speaker, when my name was called I voted "nay." I wish to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TRACEWELL]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD, is absent attending the funeral of his father. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. WASHINGTON, is detained at his room by illness. If present, he would vote "nay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The first resolution is agreed to, and the question is on the second resolution.

Mr. HITT. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. WILLIS. I offer an amendment to the second resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIS. I hope there will be unanimous consent to the addition of these words.

Mr. PEARSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 192, nays 59, not voting 104; as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am paired on this vote with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. LEONARD. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. MCCLEARY, I am informed, is at home, unable to be here. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on both resolutions.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOPKINS). The question now is on the adoption of the preamble accompanying the resolutions.

The preamble was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the preamble was agreed to was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-night it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe there was no regular order made to consider the contested-election case of Benoit against Boatner. Was there only an understanding that it would be called up?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks there was no order.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it was agreed by unanimous consent that it was to be taken up immediately after the passage of the resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was to be taken up immediately after the disposition of the resolutions that have just been disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the contested-election case of Benoit against Boatner, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER], who made the majority report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A conference report is a privileged report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York thinks his report will not take any time, I desire——

Mr. SHERMAN. It will take but a moment.

ARKANSAS NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 5564, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments to the House bill and agree to the bill as passed by the House.

JAMES S. SHERMAN,
JOHN S. LITTLE,
On the part of the House.
RICHARD F. PETTIGREW,
WILLIAM N. ROACH,
On the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BENOIT AGAINST BOATNER.

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution of the majority of the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the case of Benoit against Boatner, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there was no valid election held in the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and that neither Alexis Benoit nor Charles J. Boatner is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress as Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That C. J. Boatner was elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and is entitled to his seat as such.

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Speaker, an arrangement has been made between the majority and the minority of the Committee on Elections No. 2 that a vote shall be had on these resolutions at 4 o'clock, and that the intervening time shall be occupied by a representative of each side reading so much of the two reports as may be thought necessary for the advisement of this House as to the determination of the committee, and that the contestee, in addition to reading such portion of the minority report as he may desire to read, shall have the right, without discussion, to state briefly the reasons why he is willing that this matter should be presented to the House without debate and a vote taken and determination had to-day. And I desire to say, further, that the arrangement is, with the consent of the House, that the majority and minority reports be printed in full in the RECORD as part of the proceedings of the day. To carry out the arrangement, as far as it devolves upon me to do so, I shall proceed for a moment to read for the information of the House from the report of the majority. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. PITNEY. Is there to be any contest?

Mr. TAYLER. There is not.

Mr. PITNEY. Then what is the meaning of the resolution that has been offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]?

Mr. TAYLER. That is the usual form in which these matters are presented to the House.

Mr. PITNEY. Then the case is uncontested?

Mr. TAYLER. It is contested; and there is a minority report.

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to have some reason given for action practically without debate in this contested-election case.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, we are unable to hear what the gentleman from New Jersey says.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the programme which has been outlined be carried out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One moment. Unanimous consent is asked that a vote be had on the pending resolutions at 4 o'clock, and that the intervening time be taken up by the parties in interest, or their representatives, in the reading of such parts of the reports as may be deemed advisable. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I rose for the purpose of asking an explanation pending the request for unanimous consent, and asked to be recognized, but the Chair set me aside for the purpose of stating the proposition——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman made any objection.

Mr. PITNEY. Well, before giving my consent, I want to know whether there is a real contest here or not. If there is no actual contest, I do not want any unnecessary time to be occupied in considering the case, but if there is a real contest I think there ought to be a little more time for discussion than three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that there is here a contest by Mr. Benoit against Mr. Boatner, the sitting member. This case has been heard in the committee, and two reports have been presented: First, the report of the committee declaring the seat vacant and the election void; and second, the report of the minority presenting the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. It was the intention of the committee to have called this case up in the regular way next week and to have debated it fully, and they were prepared to do so, but Mr. Boatner suggested that he would like to have the case called up to-day and disposed of at the earliest possible moment, for the reason that in the event of the House adopting the report of the committee declaring the seat vacant, to-morrow would be the last day on which, under the law of Louisiana, the governor could give notice of an election to fill the vacancy to be held at the same time as a general election which is now pending in that State. Therefore, it is for the purpose of accommodating the contestee that this agreement has been entered into. The proposition was that the case should be brought before the House; that perhaps twenty minutes should be given to each side to discuss it, and then that a vote should be had. This, I say again, is done for the purpose of accommodating the contestee, so that in the event that the House shall indorse the report of the committee, an opportunity will be given to submit to the people of the district the question of who shall be his successor at a general election which is soon to be held in the State of Louisiana. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] if I am not correct in this statement?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman is correct, with this modification, that it is not so much for the accommodation of the contestee as it is for the accommodation of the constituency, the people of that district.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Oh, well, I am not particular about how the gentleman puts the case.

Mr. BAILEY. I will not quibble with the gentleman about it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The agreement that we have entered into simply shows that we are willing to accommodate somebody, and I am not particular about what special person or persons shall appear to be the objects of our accommodation and kindness.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman's statement is substantially correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The point was made, first, that in the event of the sitting member being unseated, the people of that district had a right to be represented upon this floor, which seemed to be an undeniable proposition; and, second, that if they were entitled to representation they were entitled to be saved the expense of a special election, if that could be done; which also seemed to me unanswerable.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the ground upon which the agreement was proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And it was thought best that the agreement should be put in the form I have stated, so that the case might be disposed of to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the request is joined in by the gentleman from Louisiana himself [Mr. BOATNER], I do not want to obstruct the arrangement.

Mr. BOATNER. I will say to the gentleman that the arrangement was made at my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TAYLER read the report of the committee, as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to whom was referred the contested election case of Alexis Benoit vs. Charles J. Boatner, from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, having considered the testimony and heard arguments on behalf of the respective parties, submit the following:

The Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana is composed of 15 parishes, as follows: Caldwell, Claiborne, Catahoula, Concordia, East Carroll, Franklin, Jackson, Lincoln, Morehouse, Madison, Ouachita, Tensas, Richland, Union, West Carroll.

The Congressional election held November 6, 1894, was the only election held in Louisiana on that day. The result, as canvassed and promulgated by the secretary of state, was as follows:

Parish.	C. J. Boatner.	Alexis Benoit.
Caldwell	467	318
Claiborne	938	819
Catahoula	589	396
Concordia	2,109	20
East Carroll	2,010	6
Franklin	637	420
Jackson	212	526
Lincoln	443	1,100
Morehouse	691	381
Madison	1,968	55
Ouachita	2,548	642
Tensas	1,037	----------
Richland	663	307
Union	765	945
West Carroll	443	59
Total	15,520	5,994

The majority for Boatner over Benoit on these returns appears to be 9,526.

This district is bounded on the north by the State of Arkansas and on the east by the Mississippi River. The Ouachita River flows through the district, but the greater part of the district lies on the east side of that river.

The parishes of Union, Claiborne, Lincoln, and Jackson lie west of the Ouachita, and no claim was made by the contestant that in them the election was not held with entire fairness. No testimony was offered respecting the conduct of the election in West Carroll Parish except to correct a clerical error concerning which there is no dispute.

The controversy, therefore, is confined to the remaining 10 parishes, viz: East Carroll, Madison, Tensas, and Concordia, which are called the "river parishes," lying as they do along the Mississippi River, and Morehouse, Richland, Franklin, Catahoula, Caldwell, and Ouachita, which lie west of the river parishes, and are either bounded or cut by the Ouachita River.

The following table shows the vote in 1894, and the white and colored voting population, by the census of 1890, in the 10 contested parishes:

Parish.	Boatner.	Benoit.	White males over 21.	Colored males over 21.	Total population of voting age.
Concordia	2,109	20	609	3,050	3,659
East Carroll	2,010	6	315	2,731	3,046
Franklin	637	420	701	768	1,469
Morehouse	691	381	828	2,615	3,443
Madison	1,968	55	340	3,027	3,367
Ouachita	2,548	642	1,441	2,547	3,988
Tensas	1,037	----------	401	3,646	4,047
Richland	663	307	818	1,557	2,375

NOTICE OF CONTEST.

The contestant, on the 16th day of January, 1895, caused to be served, at the place of residence of the contestee, a copy of his notice of contest. The contestee at that time was absent from the State of Louisiana, and it is admitted that, under the law of that State it is sufficient notice of any suit to make service of the same at the place of residence of the defendant.

The contestee moved to dismiss this proceeding on the ground that no proper notice of contest was served upon him as required by the Revised Statutes.

The committee was of the opinion and held that the service of the notice in the manner stated was sufficient under the United States statutes, and was precisely the kind of notice which was held to be sufficient in the case of Manzanares vs. Luna, Forty-eighth Congress. (Moberly's Dig., 61.)

The contestee duly served upon the contestant his answer, and the parties proceeded to take testimony in all respects as if no question had been raised as to validity of contestant's service of notice.

The contestant's notice of contest, while in general terms, was not seriously questioned as to form, and sufficiently covered the various claims made upon the testimony and in the arguments.

THE LAW OF LOUISIANA.

It is not necessary to refer with any prolixity to the election law of Louisiana, but the substance of some provisions must be quoted.

It is provided by the general election laws of 1894, in section 12, that elections shall be presided over by six commissioners and two clerks of elections, all of whom shall be residents and qualified voters of the precincts. The commissioners shall be selected from opposing political parties, provided a sufficient number of each political party reside in the precinct competent to act. The right is given to each political party to designate one person to have access to the polling booth and to witness the voting as well as the counting.

Section 14 provides that before entering upon the discharge of their duties commissioners and clerks must take the oath prescribed by article 100 of the constitution.

Section 19 provides that the registering officers of each parish shall deliver to the sheriff of each parish, at least twenty-four hours before the time fixed for opening the polls, a list of voters registered for each polling place. The list shall be in alphabetical order and shall contain the registration number of each voter. It shall be the duty of the commissioners of each precinct to erase the name of each voter when he has voted.

Section 26 provides that no person shall be permitted to vote who has not duly registered as a qualified voter in accordance with the law in the ward and precinct in which he actually resides.

Section 29 provides that any citizen of the State or commissioner of election shall have the right to require that any voter offering shall be put upon his oath and made to declare whether he is the person registered or has voted, or is a duly qualified elector of the State, parish, ward, or precinct in which he offers. A false oath by such voter subjects him to penalties for perjury; but such affidavit or affidavits herein required must be in writing and returned as a part of the election returns, to be deposited in the office of the clerk.

Section 36 provides that the commissioners of elections shall keep a list of the persons voting at the polling place, which shall be numbered from one on consecutively, such list to be kept numbered and to be signed and sworn to as correct by the commissioners immediately on closing the polls. When the count is completed the commissioners are required to make triplicate compiled statements of the persons voted for, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number of ballots rejected; and these statements shall be sworn to by the commissioners. One copy of the statements, tally sheets, and list of persons voting is forwarded to the secretary of state and the other two sets returned to the parish board of supervisors.

Section 37 provides for the compilation by the parish board of supervisors of the total vote of the various polling places, and directs that the compiled statements be forwarded to the secretary of state.

EAST CARROLL, MADISON, CONCORDIA, AND TENSAS.

Proceeding now to an examination of the evidence in this case, we consider first the river parishes, viz, East Carroll, Madison, Tensas, and Concordia. As graphic and suggestive a view of conditions in these precincts as could be presented will be manifest by an examination of the following tabular statement of the vote at the Congressional election in 1894, and the character of the population.

Parish.	Boatner.	Benoit.	White males over 21.	Colored males over 21.
Concordia	2,109	20	609	3,050
East Carroll	2,010	6	315	2,731
Madison	1,968	55	340	3,027
Tensas	1,037	.....	401	3,646
Total	7,124	81	1,665	12,454

It is certainly very suggestive that in four parishes where the male whites of voting age number 1,765 the Democratic vote should be 7,124, and that while the colored voting population is 12,454 the vote in opposition to the Democratic candidate should be only 81. The reasons for this condition are not difficult to find.

If the election returns from these parishes are reliable, it appears that not only have the negroes gone over to the Democratic party in great numbers, but that they are unanimously voting that party ticket. Yet the fact is, and appears in this case, that they are Republicans almost to a man.

In the main the same general plan prevailed of conducting in these parishes what are by courtesy styled elections. One scheme and principle dominated in all of them.

This is graphically and frankly described by G. W. Montgomery, a Democrat and supporter of the contestee and now and for twelve years a State senator from the Twenty-fifth district of Louisiana. Mr. Montgomery, on page 38, in answer to a question as to whether or not he advocated a fair count, a fair vote, said:

"I recognized in the ranks of the opposition men who had hitherto helped fight the battle of Democracy, and felt that no attacks upon their rights could be made without an irreconcilable breach. I furthermore felt that if Mr. Boatner had a majority of the white people of the district, that he had no need to ask for irregular methods, and if Mr. Benoit had a majority of the white people supporting his cause, I could not, without violating the principles of white supremacy, for which I have fought for a quarter of a century, ask for anything more than a square count."

Q. Was there a square election in the parish of Madison?

A. I will say that the election was as fair as usual.

Q. How are they usually?

(Contestee objects to investigation of any other election except the last one.)

A. They are usually fair enough to put the white people in control of parochial matters.

Q. How is this done; by counting the negro vote?

A. As a rule it is.

Q. Is this done whether the race is between Democrats or Republicans or between Democrats and Democrats?

A. I will say of recent years it will apply to both with impartiality; the race between Foster and McEnery evidences this fact.

For the leading Democratic politician and statesman in these river parishes to assert that the rule prevailing there is "to put the white people in control by counting the negro vote" is an admission, by one who knows, of everything for which this report contends.

How this negro vote could be thus counted is plainly apparent from the evidence in the record.

The condition of things referred to by Senator Montgomery had continued so long that residents of the river parishes had ceased to expect fair elections; the mode of counting the negroes was perfectly and universally understood and by no one ever questioned; the public conscience was debauched and demoralized; the colored voter was hopeless and helpless.

Yet it was necessary to use the machinery of elections—to go through the form of holding an election—and to make certain formal returns which might suffice to insure the election of the Democratic candidates.

In one parish the registration list was enormously padded; in another, where the total registration list was about 1,000, over 2,000 voters were returned as polled. It is safe to assert that not 300 votes were actually cast in the entire parish. In one precinct, for example, the registered number of voters was 83; the number returned as cast was 442.

The poll books and tally sheets from almost every precinct of these parishes have disappeared from the sight of man. Although great diligence was used to discover them, not one could be found; nor could any witness, whether commissioner or clerk, be discovered who knew anything about them. Many commissioners of election refused to obey subpœnas; some who responded refused to testify, or, testifying, refused to answer on the ground that the answers might tend to criminate them; some, acting under legal advice, refused to answer any question respecting the returns on the ground that the returns themselves were the best evidence; others refused to give information as to the whereabouts of poll books and tally sheets on the ground that they were not the lawful custodians of them, and were not bound to furnish information respecting them.

One commissioner, working in a field, saw the notary approaching and literally took to the woods, and so far as the evidence shows has not since been heard of.

The poll book in one parish was padded, and the registration numbers increased in one instance by skipping from 99 to 1,000, and in other instances jumping in similar manner 900 numbers, so that the total registration appeared to be something over 8,000. The registrar of voters who came into office in 1888 opened a new book beginning with No. 1, and at the time of the election of 1894 had only 570 names on his list. If it had been possible to obtain the poll books much light as to the details of the conspiracy might have been obtained.

Very few of the returns are sworn to. This important and mandatory requirement was neglected, doubtless because the commissioners thought that whatever crime they might be guilty of the charge of perjury could not be laid at their door. The sensitive conscience of these election officers, who would deliberately defile and pollute the ballot box, revolted against making oath to a lie.

In some precincts the returns were signed in blank and not even one of the officers thus signing does reverence to his own certificate.

The claim is gravely made by prominent Democrats respecting these as well as the other parishes in which the negro vote is large that the owner of a plantation has a right to vote the negroes who work for him; and in some quarters conflict arose between white Democrats and Populists, the latter contending for the same privilege of voting their negroes which they had exercised when they were Democrats. The testimony shows that very few voters undertook to vote, and that the commissioners of election counted such number of ballots for the contestee as they thought the exigencies of the case required.

In all of these parishes it is clearly apparent that no Democrat recognizes the right of a negro to cast a vote according to his own will, and that whether he votes or not is a matter entirely immaterial to the commissioners of election or the candidates. If the negro votes, he is compelled to vote the Democratic ticket; if he does not vote, he is counted as having voted the Democratic ticket.

The right of suffrage in these parishes is a farce. No witness, Democrat, Populist, or Republican, who was questioned upon the subject pretended that any election there, in so far as the negro vote was concerned, was fair. No one pretends that the negro will be permitted to vote unless he votes according to the direction of a Democratic employer or a Democratic leader, and the best that could be said of the election of 1894 is that it was not any worse than its predecessors.

The contestee, Boatner, admitted in his written statement filed with the committee that of the 7,124 votes counted for him in these four parishes, over 6,000 ought to be excluded.

It is doubtless true that the election in the four river parishes November 6, 1894, was the quietest known for many years. It appears from the evidence that very few electors voted; probably not more than one to every five returned.

It is doubtless true, also, that the election in these parishes was as fair as any they have had for years, except in the gubernatorial contest of 1892.

The fact is that it has come to be a part of the political life of those parishes—a necessity to the dominant spirits there—that elections shall be absolutely controlled in the interests of the Democrats, and that they are ready and able to return any majority which may be considered necessary. It would have been quite as easy for these people to return a majority of 10,000 or 12,000 for Boatner as it was to return the majority of 7,000. In a word, all appearance, all pretense of fair elections has been abandoned; everybody recognizes and admits it.

CATAHOULA PARISH.

In the parish of Catahoula the same character of fraud was perpetrated as in the river parishes, with the addition that the alphabetical mode of voting people who were dead or not at the polls was to some extent resorted to. We know this, because it so happens that, while the original voting list of the precinct known as Sicily Island was not in evidence and was lost, a copy of it made before it was lost was sworn to and put in evidence. It is not only apparent from an inspection of this voting list that the election in that precinct was saturated with fraud, but several persons, who appear to have voted, testify that they did not vote, and others who were dead are reported as having voted. In that precinct the contestee is credited with all the votes that were cast, viz, 252. Naturally the returns are not sworn to, nor are they in Beards precinct, in which the contestee is credited with 126—all of the votes reported as cast in the precinct. In other precincts of this parish, also, the returns are not sworn to.

MOREHOUSE, CALDWELL, AND FRANKLIN PARISHES.

In Morehouse, Caldwell, and Franklin enough intimidation was resorted to to prevent any interference by Republicans or Populists in such portions of the parish as the Democrats desired to control. For instance, F. C. Overby, a lifelong resident of Morehouse Parish, a white man, a sugar planter, who advocated the election of the contestant, testifies, on page 140:

"I live in the Seventh Ward, said parish of Morehouse, La. With the exception of about three years I have lived in the parish all my life. I was appointed a commissioner of Congressional election held November 6, 1894. I did not serve. I felt certain that it would cost me my life to serve. I had been told that if I came to the polls on that day that I had better come heavily armed. I am a Populist. I was told this by the opposition Democrats. I was busy making sirup at my cane mill on morning previous to the election, November 5, 1894; I was called upon by a party of eight supporters of Colonel Boatner and told that I was advocating against their interest in working for Mr. Benoit. These parties were all white. It may be that one or two of them were not of age, but were able to bear arms. The spokesman of the crowd stated that they fed the negro and proposed to vote them. He stated further that as between the two candidates they had no special preference, but were afraid to allow the negro to vote at all, lest in future elections there might be a Republican candidate, in which event the negro would wish to support the Republican; that if he was allowed to vote now as he wanted to they would have considerable trouble to prevent them voting Republican. I told them that I could not see wherein the election of Mr. Benoit would be in any wise detrimental to their interests, for the fact that my interests were the same as theirs, practically; that I considered in supporting Mr. Benoit that I was working for my interest and equally as much for theirs. After some discussion on the matter, I told them that so far as electioneering was concerned I was perfectly willing that there should be no more done. The spokesman then invited anyone else of his party to say to me anything that he saw fit, or something to that effect, stating that he had about said all that he thought was necessary. Another member of the crowd addressed me thus: 'As second spokesman of this crowd, I want to say to you that unless you stop using your influence for Mr. Benoit you will not be permitted to live in this country.' I replied that I could die here. He retorted, 'It will be a noble death, but you will have it to do;' and he told me to be a man or a mouse, and I replied, with some asperity, that I would be a man pretty quick if the rest of the gentlemen would see fair play. I had previously made a speech in favor of Mr. Benoit at Gallion, in which I stated my intention as a commissioner of the approaching election to use my utmost endeavors in the interest of fairness. At the time of this attack or visit, another member of this party took exception to this remark. Considerable discussion followed between him and myself. I reminded him of the fact that he himself had made the same assertion in a speech following mine, on the same occasion. I also asked him why he called on me to speak if he didn't expect me to do what I could in the interest of my candidate. He replied that he thought that I would make a speech on broad and patriotic principles. I don't know what he meant by this remark, unless he meant that I would make a speech for Mr. Boatner. They all contended that they did not intend to allow negroes to vote for Mr. Benoit. I told them that I still intended to arm myself and go to the polls and perform my duty as commissioner of election. Finally, they became so vehement in their language, and believing that they were fully determined to carry into execution their various threats, I decided in my mind, in view of their superior numbers, that it would be foolhardy in myself to uselessly sacrifice my life. At this time they were about on the point of departure; I asked them to wait a few moments until I could come to a more definite conclusion about the matter. After considering the matter a few moments I arrived at the above-mentioned conclusion, and told them to hear me. I told them that I wanted them to distinctly understand that in making this concession that it was not through fear of them, that I did not value my life so highly, but for the reason that I had a family of six small children and a wife who would be left in bad condition financially, were I to be taken from her at the time. They then rode off and I turned back into my mill room, and as I did so I heard the remark made by one of them: 'He had more sense than I thought he had.' During the time of this visit there was a great deal more said on both sides of a similar nature, but I believe that this is about the substance and will convey a correct idea of what was done and said, and the object and intent of the visit, on the part of the Democrats. This visit had the effect of keeping me from attending the polls and voting and from acting as commissioner of election."

The rule seems to be well established in this Congressional district that a planter has a right to vote all the negroes in his employ without any interference from anyone.

E. Girod, who has resided in Caldwell Parish all his life, a Democrat, for six years sheriff of the parish, present member from that parish of the Democratic State central committee and a former deputy United States internal-revenue collector under Cleveland's first Administration, testifies as follows, on page 23:

"It is the practice and avowed purpose of the managers on the river to vote the negroes on their plantations. Some of the voters came to me on the day of election. They were negro voters. There were two negro voters from that ward that came to me and stated that they had escaped some men that were hunting them and asked me to protect them. They claimed that they did not want to vote for Mr. Boatner, and stated that they had been told that they would not be allowed to vote for anyone else. One of these negroes stated who was hunting them; said it was J. S. Swift, C. B. Smith, and Dick Milner. These last three mentioned men are supporters of Mr. Boatner. C. B. Smith lives in town; the other lives in Ward 1. C. B. Smith is the man called Neb Smith by McClanahan and Humphries. At that time Neb Smith was a resident of Ward 4."

Q. Mr. Girod, is it not a fact that planters and their managers on river places in Caldwell Parish usually vote their negro laborers and tenants?

A. Yes.

Q. Mr. Girod, is it not also true that they very seldom meet with any difficulty whatever in persuading their negro laborers and tenants to vote with them unless meddled with by outside persons who have no interest in their welfare?

A. I will state that it is a fact that the planters never have any trouble in voting their labor when the planters are united in the support of one ticket.

Q. Mr. Girod, according to the theory of the river planters that the manager of the plantation should vote the hands, would the hands on the place managed by you in Ward 1 have voted for Boatner unless they were coerced to do so?

A. The hands on the plantation, with one exception, have told me since the election that they desired to vote for Benoit, but were told at the polls that they would not be permitted to do so; J. E. McClanahan managed St. Albin's plantation; Mrs. Smith owns a plantation in Ward 1, that was managed by L. H. Wooten, who lived on one adjoining; Mr. L. Wooten owns a place of his own; Mr. L. H. Wooten didn't support anybody; L. H. Wooten is an uncle to C. E. Wooten; C. E. Wooten was a supporter of Mr. Boatner. The planters, as a rule, in Ward 1, do not allow anyone opposed to them in politics to electioneer with their labor; they consider such, meddling with their hands. This rule is more strictly adhered to in national and Congressional elections than in local elections; in the former it is carried out strictly; Mr. I. McClanahan came to the polls in Ward 2 at about 12 or 1 o'clock on the day of election.

OUACHITA PARISH.

In this parish is situated the city of Monroe, where both contestant and contestee reside. It is claimed by the contestee that the best citizens of Monroe supported him, and this is no doubt true; but it appears as well that a considerable majority of the voting population in this parish are negroes, and that so much intimidation was used toward them, both on the day of election and prior to that time, and such steps were taken to make sure that every negro who voted the Populist ticket should be known, that it is not surprising that in a parish where the negroes outnumbered the whites almost two to one the Democratic candidate should receive 2,548 votes and the Populist 642.

It is perfectly apparent that notice was served upon the colored voters that they must vote open tickets, and as to some who were discovered voting for the contestant threats were made that they would hear later concerning their votes, and that watchers were posted at the polls to take down the names of such negroes as refused to vote an open ticket, or who openly voted the Populist ticket.

Much stress was laid upon the fact that some of the commissioners of election in the city of Monroe were recognized to be reputable citizens. A very cursory examination of the evidence in this case will disclose the proved fact that the reputable, no less than the disreputable, citizens believe in preserving white supremacy at any cost, and that in this election, while some protested that it made little difference to them, as between the contestant and contestee, which was elected, yet, that if the negroes were permitted on this occasion to vote any other than the Democratic ticket, a dangerous precedent would be set for future elections, and that it was quite as necessary to prevent votes for the Populist candidate as if the opposing candidate had been a Republican. It is quite as clearly apparent from the evidence respecting Ouachita parish as it is of the others that the owners of plantations claimed the right to vote their "niggers," and that no person representing any other party was permitted to electioneer among the colored men on their plantations.

Captain Weaks, formerly United States marshal for the western district of Louisiana, and not a supporter of either candidate, testifies (page 118) that it is a matter of general repute that the owners and managers of plantations in Ouachita vote the negroes as they please.

The claim of plantation managers in Ouachita to vote the negroes who worked for them raised an interesting ethical question respecting the right to vote negro renters. It is hoped that, in the interest of harmony, a speedy settlement may be had of this important question, which threatens to create warring factions among the Democratic leaders.

The testimony of Samuel Whited furnishes an interesting picture of the prevailing conditions and of the spirit of unrest as to who, if anyone, has the right to vote a negro who rents a farm and works for himself. He testifies as follows, on page 94:

Q. Did you meet any persons on the road home?

A. Yes, sir; several. I met six or seven men on horseback coming from the east this way; when I met them, riding horseback nearly past them, they stopped me; one said he wanted to speak to me. I stopped and told them all good evening, and asked what they wanted with me. One said there was a man on my place; they thought they ought to vote him. I asked them the reason; they told me the reason; I told them they could do that.

Q. What else occurred?

A. They told me they had been in our cotton country.

A. One of the parties said to me: "I understand that you have been electioneering with the negroes for Benoit." I asked him who told him so. He said he heard it—heard men say so. I asked him if any white man told him that. He didn't answer that question that time. I asked him the place. He told me it was on the King place. I told him he was mistaken, for I had not been on the King place since Mr. Walker died. I asked him then if a black man told him; he said it was. I think I told him then that that was no evidence, because he had told me that he wouldn't take a negro's word at election time. I said: "If you can't take a negro's evidence you haven't heard it."

Q. Did he object to your electioneering with the negroes for Benoit?

A. Yes, sir; he said they must control the negroes; they didn't want any Populistic Republican ideas taught the negroes. He asked me then if I was a Republican. I told him I used to be. I told him I used to be a Democrat before he was born, I thought. He asked me if I ever voted for Democratic candidates. I told him yes. I asked him the question whether the negroes that were renting on places for themselves, if they were not free to vote as he or I, and he replied they should not be allowed to vote.

Q. How many of these gentlemen were present?

A. I think eight; I'm sure six.

Q. Were they plantation managers?

A. Yes, sir; principally.

Q. What did they say they had gone to Ward 2 for that day?

A. They said they went out there to see what was going on; they had heard there was a good deal of dissensions.

Q. What had they gone there for?

A. They went there to see if they were going to vote right, was what they gave me to understand.

Q. Why did they claim to vote this negro man on your place?

A. This negro man they wanted to vote had went away from my place after he had contracted with me to work for me in 1894 on the farm. They assisted me in bringing him back to the place to fulfill his contract, was the only reason they claimed him from me.

Q. Do plantation managers claim the right to vote the negroes under their control?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do they, or did they, claim that it was improper and inadmissible for anyone to electioneer or canvass negroes on their plantations?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they give any reason for your electioneering for negroes on the King place?

A. No; they said it would not be allowed; it was outside the rules.

Q. Did any of these gents own or control the King place?

A. No, sir.

Q. They complained of your electioneering on that place because they claimed the right to vote the negroes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you at the polls in the colony during the election?

A. Part of the day; two hours and a half or three hours.

Q. Was there anyone present at the polls taking down the names of the negroes and how they voted?

A. I don't know if they were taking down the names, but they were watching very closely how they voted.

Q. Did you hear them speak to the negroes as to how they voted?

A. Yes, sir—

A. He said "There is a damned negro who voted for Benoit," and they were watching around generally. There were no objections made to men's hands as they voted from places, but these objections were made to those who rented lands.

Nothing could more clearly appear than that the actual violence and bloodshed of former years had had such effect as that an appearance of violence and a threat to do violence was effective throughout the greater part of this district to prevent negroes from voting, or, if they did vote, from voting anything but the Democratic ticket.

In 10 out of the 15 parishes hardly a precinct was free from fraud, intimidation, and violence. In some of the parishes, notably in the four river parishes, the fraud was universally prevalent. The violence and intimidation of former years had done their work, and a very slight show of either was sufficient to keep the negroes away from the polls. Fraud in manipulating the poll lists and the count accomplished the rest.

It must not be assumed that this review of the case has undertaken to advert to more than a small part of the testimony presented, or to refer to more than a few of the circumstances which conclusively developed and proved the fraud, violence, and intimidation. Enough, however, has been adverted to to demonstrate that the right of suffrage, as recognized by the Constitution and the laws, does not exist in at least 10 out of the 15 parishes in the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, that that right is denied to a large majority of the voters of the district, and that in those parishes of the district which contain 29,000 out of 41,500 of the voting population there was, and could be under the circumstances, no expression of the popular will, and therefore no valid election.

And even if this were not so to the grave and serious extent to which it actually did go, we are yet of opinion that the condition of affairs which prevailed in the four river parishes is of itself sufficient to justify the conclusion, as a matter of law, that no valid election was held on the 6th day of November, 1894, in the Fifth district of Louisiana.

It appears, as already indicated, that in those parishes, by the census of 1890, the colored male population of voting age was 12,454 and the white male population of voting age was 1,765. In so far as testimony is to be relied upon it is clear that the colored voters in those parishes are Republicans, and would, if the opportunity was offered them, vote the Republican ticket, and would, if they voted at all, on all occasions vote against a Democratic candidate. The returns from these parishes give the contestee 7,124 votes and the contestant 81.

The inference from this fact and from the testimony bearing on it is that while it can not be said that any certain number of colored voters would have voted for Benoit if there had been a free ballot, yet that beyond question a very small fraction of the number returned for Boatner actually voted for him.

It may be, therefore, that full justice can not be done by simply disregarding the returns from these parishes. It may be, and it probably is, true that a large number of the voters would, had they been permitted, have voted for the contestant. It may be that upon a fair, unintimidated vote in those parishes a sufficient majority might have been given to the contestant to overcome the majority of the contestee in the other parishes. That majority was in the other eleven parishes only 2,483.

If no question were raised as to the validity of the election outside of the river parishes, the House, in justice to itself, and in the interest of fair and honest elections, giving full weight to the facts apparent in this testimony, would be compelled to declare the election void. It could not declare the contestant elected because it can not say, and the contestant did not have it in his power to determine, how many votes the contestant would have received in those four parishes if a free and honest election had been conducted. It would have been physically impossible to take the testimony of six or eight thousand witnesses as to the person for whom they voted or would have voted if permitted to cast their ballots, and in addition to that the very circumstances that prevented their voting would have prevented their testifying.

This case discloses as well the difficulty in obtaining testimony and inducing men to testify as it does the intimidation practiced to prevent their voting. To invoke the rule which demands that returns from the tainted precincts be thrown out would still leave the contestee elected. It seems to us that in such a case the only thing that can be done is to declare the election void. To do otherwise would be to furnish an easy, safe, and certain mode of perpetrating a stupendous fraud, and the more stupendous the more effective.

We therefore conclude as matters of fact—

First. That fraud, violence, and intimidation so permeated the election of November 6, 1894, except in the parishes of Claiborne, Franklin, Jackson, Lincoln, and West Carroll, that there was no free expression of the popular will; that fraud, violence, and intimidation were so extensive and general as to render it certain that there was no fair and free expression by the great body of the electors, more than two-thirds of the electors of the district residing in the remaining 10 parishes.

Second. That in view of the fact that the majority for the contestee in the 11 parishes outside of the river parishes was 2,483, and that in the river parishes, where there is a majority of over 10,000 negroes of voting age, fraud was universal; that while it is impossible to determine how many votes the contestant would have received if a fair and honest election had been held, justice and good morals revolt against the proposition that any valid election was held.

We therefore hold as a proposition of law, growing out of the principle laid down in Sypher vs. St. Martin (2d Bartlett, 699), as follows:

If fraud, violence, and intimidation have been so extensive and general as to render it certain that there has been no free and fair expression by the great body of the electors, then the election must be set aside, notwithstanding the fact that in some of the precincts or parishes there was a peaceable and fair election.

We ought to say to the people of the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana that whoever comes to this House with a certificate of election from that district must have behind that certificate an honest expression of the people's will at the polls, and we therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That there was no valid election held in the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and that neither Alexis Benoit nor Charles J. Boatner is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress as Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana."

Before the reading of the foregoing report was concluded,

Mr. BAILEY said: I do not like to interrupt the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER], but the clock will admonish him that he has now consumed a little more than half the time allowed to his side.

Mr. TAYLER. I believe I was a little late in beginning; but I am willing that the time of the other side should be extended in return for any extra time I may occupy. I am now almost through.

Mr. TAYLER resumed the reading of the report, but was interrupted by

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOPKINS), who said: The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] has now occupied several minutes more than one-half of the three-quarters of an hour allowed to the two sides.

Mr. TAYLER. I shall be through in one minute. I am willing that there shall be an extension of time on the other side.

Mr. TAYLER resumed and concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] whatever time I may be entitled to.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] have both stated the reasons for the submission of this question to the House without debate. I deem it necessary and proper to say that under no other circumstances than those stated would I have consented that the House should be called upon to vote on this question without a full understanding of it; but appreciating that the question should be settled to-day, I solicited the chairman and members of the committee to bring the matter before the House at this time, and they could only do so under these conditions—that is, without debate—and it was agreed that either side should read such portions of the report and the views of the minority as might be thought pertinent to the question. I will therefore consume the remainder of my time in reading such portions of the views of the minority as I think most pertinent; and I ask the special attention of the House.

Mr. BOATNER proceeded to read from the views of the minority of the committee, which, as subsequently ordered to be published in full, are as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The majority of your Committee on Elections No. 2 have reached the conclusion that the election for Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, held November 6, 1894, was void, and the undersigned, being unable to concur in this conclusion, and being, moreover, convinced that the contestee was lawfully elected to represent said district, herewith present their views.

The Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana is composed of the following parishes, whose vote, at the last election, as returned, is as follows:

Parish.	C. J. Boatner.	Alexis Benoit.	E. M. Graham.
Caldwell	467	318	----------
Claiborne	938	819	----------
Catahoula	589	396	----------
Concordia	2,109	20	----------
East Carroll	2,010	6	----------
Franklin	637	420	----------
Jackson	212	526	----------
Lincoln	443	1,100	13
Morehouse	691	381	----------
Madison	1,968	55	----------
Ouachita	2,548	642	----------
Tensas	1,037	----------	----------
Richland	663	307	----------
Union	765	945	----------
West Carroll	443	59	----------
Total	15,520	5,994	13

The contestant attacks the returns from the following parishes: Concordia, Catahoula, Caldwell, East Carroll, West Carroll, Franklin, Morehouse, Ouachita, and Richland, against which he alleges both fraud and intimidation to his prejudice.

In order that a full and perfect understanding of the case may be had, we quote the following charges against each parish, and apply the testimony in support and rebuttal thereof:

CONCORDIA.

The charge against this parish is as follows:

"That at an election or pretended election, purporting to have been held upon the 6th day of November, 1894, in the parish of Concordia, for a Congressman to represent the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, no election was really held; but that in accordance with the usual custom in the four 'river parishes' blank returns were signed by the commissioners and filled out at the parish seat and forwarded to Baton Rouge, the State capital, for official promulgation, purporting to be the returns at which you received 2,009 votes and I 20, when in truth and in fact no lawful election had been held, but that if such an election could have been held and true, correct, and lawful return thereof made, the result would have been as follows in said parish of Concordia:

Boatner	100

"That at least the vote of the entire parish should be rejected and thrown out and not counted, because of the illegal and fraudulent practices aforesaid, all of which was done and committed by your political friends and partisans."

The testimony of the following witnesses was taken in behalf of contestant. Contestee was not present nor represented at the hearing, and therefore the witnesses were not cross-examined, to wit: F. L. Campbell, Philip Hough, A. H. Gillespie, J. K. Skipwith, and J. A. Turpin. Their testimony is to be found on page 81 et seq. of the record, and wholly fails to establish any of the charges made. The pertinent part of Campbell's testimony we quote:

Q. Is it not a fact that the negroes on these plantations, as a general rule, take no interest in politics of late years?

A. Can't say that; in 1892 we had the fiercest conflict in the parish we ever had.

Q. That was when the whites were divided?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There were Republican candidates also at that election?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did the election go?

A. It went Democratic. It went for Foster.

Q. Leaving that campaign out, is it not a fact that they take very little interest?

A. They didn't take much interest in the last election.

Q. The same political conditions prevail as in the other four parishes, pretty much?

A. I don't know; the absence of excitement was due to there being no opposition; one of the political parties was scarcely represented.

Q. Do you know whether or not it is customary for the commissioners in this parish to make returns not sworn to?

A. No, sir; I do not. I have been commissioner of returns at a number of elections, and they were always sworn to.

Philip Hough testified substantially that the negroes took no interest in the election in his ward; that they have not taken an "excitable interest" in elections since 1878. Asked "if it is not a fact that the prevailing impression among the negroes that their votes would not be counted if cast has not caused them to refrain from going to the polls or taking any part in the elections of the river parishes," he replies:

"Of my own knowledge I can not state, but this is the prevailing impression."

J. K. Skipwith and J. A. Turpin were commissioners of election at different polls and utterly fail to substantiate the charges of contestant. The following, from the testimony of J. K. Skipwith, requires no comment:

Q. Isn't it a fact that there was very little interest in that election as far as you know?

A. No, sir; as far as I know there was a considerable interest in it. I was here, the grand jury adjourned, district court adjourned, police jury adjourned so as to vote. There was considerable interest in it.

Q. Was there any interest or canvass in the election?
A. My impression is that Boatner spoke here once after he was nominated.
Q. How many votes were cast by voters at the second precinct on that day?
A. The votes counted out of the box were actually cast.
Q. How many votes were counted out of the box?
A. One hundred and forty-six.

Upon this testimony, which fails to show a single fact adverse to the contestee, and without any evidence whatever to show that the voters of the parish of Concordia could not and did not freely and voluntarily exercise the right of suffrage at the recent Congressional election, the House is asked to disregard the returns from this parish and reject 2,009 votes for contestee. It is a most significant and important fact that contestant has failed to show that he had any support or supporters in this parish except the 20 votes returned for him, that he made any canvass in it, or had any just right to suppose that under the circumstances he would receive or might reasonably expect to receive any considerable support.

The usual argument, or rather inference, that the negro will, if not unlawfully prevented from doing so, vote the Republican ticket, can have no application here, because the contestant was running as a nominee of the Populist party; had not been indorsed by the Republicans; was not being supported by any Republican leader in the district, and hence it can not be contended that negroes would have voted for him unless prevented from doing so. The contestee, on the contrary, was well known, had represented the district three successive terms, and according to the testimony of contestant's witnesses, stood well with both the white and colored voters of that parish. It is very true that the returns are informal; in some instances not sworn to at all, and in others the law being only partially complied with, but the election law of Louisiana provides that:

"No election shall be vitiated on account of any neglect, illegal or improper act or conduct of any officer or person unless it be proved in the contest that enough electors were deprived of their votes to have changed the result of that election." (Section 39, act of 1894.)

And the supreme court of Louisiana, construing similar provisions in prior statutes, has held that:

"The omission to comply with directory provisions, unaccompanied by evidence of fraud, will not vitiate returns or invalidate an election." (8 N. S., La., 14; 9 La. Annual, 577; 10 La. A., 732; 13 A., 301; 29 A., 610; 14 Barb., 259; Cooley's Constitutional Lim., 618-625, note 1, page 618.)

A careful examination of the evidence relating to the returns from this parish has enabled us to make a table showing the wards and polling places in which the essential features of the law were complied with and those in which no attempt to do so was made, which is as follows:

Ward.	Name.	Sworn.	Unsworn.
2	do		146
3	do		442
4	do		1
5	do	530
6	do		100
7	do		300
8	do	229
8, 9th precinct	do	147
10	do		6
	Benoit		15
10, 13th precinct	Boatner	30

The election law of Louisiana requires that triplicate tally sheets and a triplicate consolidated statement of the ballots found in the boxes shall be made. It also requires that a list of the persons voting shall be kept, numbered in the order that they present themselves for voting. All this must be sworn to by the commissioners. A consolidated statement of the vote, tally sheets, and the statement of the voters must be deposited with the clerk of the court, a consolidated statement and tally sheet with the secretary of state, and another with the local board of returning officers. It will be seen that the preparation of these papers requires very considerable labor and some skill. The Congressional elections in this district have practically gone by default for the last four terms, and the contestant, having made no canvass in this parish and having no support there, it naturally occurred that the election officials were extremely careless in the performance of their official duties.

Desiring, however, to be absolutely safe in our contention, we claim for the contestee only the vote from those wards where the returns were made according to law, or if deficient, only partially so. An examination of the testimony of A. H. Gillespie, sworn for contestant, shows that the returns from Wards 5, 8, and 10 were sworn to by the commissioners, with the exception of the list of voters, to which they failed to attach their affidavit; but no fraud whatever being proved with respect to these wards, we submit that the election can not be vitiated on account of the neglect of the officers to perform this duty.

These wards give Boatner 936 votes. To this can be added the vote from Ward 6, amounting to 100, proved up by J. K. Skipwith, contestant's witness, to have been correctly returned according to the vote cast. This makes Boatner's total vote from parish 1,036, from which deduct 5 votes cast for Benoit, leaving his majority 1,031.

CATAHOULA.

The charges against this parish are as follows:

"First. In the election precinct or voting place commonly called Sicily Island, in the parish of Catahoula, at an election for a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, only 40 votes were actually cast, but your political friends and partisans returned or caused to be returned 256 votes for you and none for me. I shall insist that the entire vote of said box at Sicily Island be rejected and not counted for you, as was illegally and wrongfully done.

"Second. That at the election precinct or voting place commonly known as Beards Point, in the parish of Catahoula, at the election only 26 votes were actually cast, but that your political friends and partisans illegally and wrongfully counted or caused to be counted for you 126 votes as having been actually cast.

"Third. I further and more distinctly allege that these wrongs and frauds were perpetrated by commissioners of election, or other persons who were your political friends, supporters, and partisans.

"Fifth. That by the fraudulent acts aforesaid, done and committed by your political friends and partisans to my prejudice and for the advancement of your political fortunes, there were returned from said parish 392 votes which you did not receive, and therefore not entitled to, and that with the aforementioned fraudulent votes rejected and disallowed for you the count of votes in the parish of Catahoula will be and ought to be as follows, to wit:

The evidence, in our opinion, sustains the charge of fraud at the two precincts named, Wards 2 and 10, but following the rule laid down in the recent case of Aldrich vs. Robbins, contestee is entitled to the votes which contestant admits that he received at these two boxes, to wit, 40 votes at Ward 2 and 26 at Ward 10.

The following, compiled from contestant's testimony, will show the returns from the several wards which were sworn to and those not sworn to, showing 166 legally returned for Benoit and 89 for Boatner; to which last add 66 received in Wards 2 and 10, making Boatner's total vote 155, which deducted from Benoit's vote of 166, leaves the latter's majority in the parish 11 votes.

The returns from the polls we reject were totally devoid of any compliance by the commissioners with the legal requirements, and we reject them as we did similar returns from Concordia, though in neither case is there any proof of fraud; but where neither the tally sheets, list of voters, nor the consolidated statement are sworn to or signed by the commissioners we do not consider it safe to treat the returns as official.

Bringing forward Boatner's majority of 1,031 in Corcordia and deducting Benoit's majority of 11 in this parish, Boatner's net majority stands 1,020.

CALDWELL.

The charges against this parish are as follows:

"That upon the 6th day of November, 1894, there was held in the parish of Caldwell an election for a Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana to the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States of America, and that at said election and by the illegal and fraudulent conduct of your political friends and partisans I was deprived of the votes of many legal electors of said parish, and that many others were forced by fears and threats of violence to their persons to vote for you and against me, who if left to vote free and untrammeled would have voted for me and against you, to wit:

"Seventh. In the beat or voting place commonly called Columbia, in the same parish of Caldwell, the votes of fully 100 legal electors who voted for me were counted for you and against me, and that in addition to the number of votes returned for me from said box or voting place I am entitled to and will claim 105 additional votes.

"Eighth. At the precinct or polling place at which were cast the votes of Ward 7 in said parish of Caldwell, bribery was resorted to by giving or offering to give sums of money to those who would vote for you and against me, and by this action on the part of your political friends and partisans I was illegally and wrongfully deprived of 30 votes which I otherwise would have received and that I am entitled, in all fairness, to have the said number of votes counted for me and returned accordingly against you.

"Ninth. That at the precinct or voting place in Ward 1 of the said parish of Caldwell the election was held in violation of all law and order, for the following reasons, to wit: My political friends and supporters were denied access to the place at which the voting was done; that firearms were stacked in or about or near to the voting place in an unlawful manner and for an unlawful purpose, to wit, to intimidate voters in your interest; all of which prevented a fair and honest and free election. I further allege and claim that at this voting place many legally qualified electors were forced by threats and fear of personal violence to vote for you and against me who otherwise would have voted for me, and that many voters who refused to go to the voting place in said ward for the reason that they knew they would be forced to vote against me, their choice for Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, and for you, who was distinctly not their choice, were followed and pursued upon horses by your political friends and supporters and forced to return and vote for you and against me, and that many others, who eluded the pursuers (your friends and partisans) and did not vote at all were counted as having been present and voting for you and against me.

"For the reasons above set forth, and others, it is apparent that I would have received 200 more votes at said voting place than were returned for me, and I shall therefore claim that your right to 200 of these votes be rejected and thrown out, and not counted for you, but for me.

"Tenth. That I shall therefore claim that a true, correct, and honest election and return of the votes thereof from the aforementioned voting places would show that there were cast in the said parish of Caldwell votes as follows, to wit:

The foregoing charges are fully and conclusively refuted, and it appears, from the evidence, that the only intimidation attempted was by two adherents of the contestant, named, respectively, Emile Girod and J. E. McClannahan.

The contestant attacks Ward 1, which gave contestee 270 votes, and Ward 4, which gave him 146 votes. Contestant also claims the vote in Wards 2 and 5, which were thrown out by the supervisors on the ground that more ballots were found in the boxes than names of voters on the poll lists.

Ward 1 is attacked on the ground of intimidation, and the testimony of J. E. Humphrey, Emile Girod, and J. E. McClannahan is relied upon to support it.

J. E. Humphreys, according to his testimony, is a Populist, who lives in the western or upland portion of the parish. The day before the election he repaired to Ward 1, where he proposed to electioneer in behalf of contestant. He claims that he was advised by the friends of contestee, H. W. McCloud, C. E. Wooton, and Dr. E. L. Wright, not to remain at the polling place; that they could not vouch for his safety, and that there were 25 shotguns stacked in the store at the place of the meeting, and owing to threats that J. E. McClannahan had made, the citizens had forbid any parties from any other ward in the parish coming into their ward and working for Benoit, stating that McClannahan had threatened to bring parties in from other wards and force them to let the negroes vote as they pleased.

These parties kindly agreed to entertain him for the night, but advised him not to attempt to remain the next day, and told him that they forbade and would not allow him to electioneer with the people on their plantations, or those off their plantations.

This witness also testified that Mr. L. H. Wooton told him that his negroes wanted to vote for Benoit and were not permitted to do so.

Both McClannahan and Girod testified that the negroes had told them that they desired to vote for contestant, but were not permitted to do so.

Contestee, in rebuttal of this testimony, called the school-teacher and justice of the peace of the ward; H. R. McEnery, planter; H. B. Powell, merchant and planter; R. W. Milner, clerk; C. E. Wooten, merchant and planter; J. C. Mills, plantation manager; H. H. Filhiol, planter; C. B. Smith, planter; H. W. McCloud, plantation manager, and W. H. Hall, the Populist commissioner of elections; also the following colored men living in the neighborhood: Charles Green, Richard Hunter, W. W. Hall, Vandy Jacobs, Robert Williams, Price Logan, Charles Jacobs, Homer Williams, and Ennis Creft; 10 white men and 10 negroes, all residents of the immediate neighborhood in which this intimidation is said to have occurred.

It appears from their testimony that contestant did not have either a white or a colored supporter in the ward, so far as known; that the planters unanimously favored the election of contestee and actively supported him; that the negroes were also his friends and unanimously supported him; that on the day of the election, in so far from their being any appearance of intimidation, the negroes had a general jollification and ran pony horse races all day. The comparison of the testimony of these witnesses with that of Mr. Girod and Mr. McClannahan will show that the latter two were endeavoring to intimidate certain colored voters who had been under their management into the support of the contestant; that McClannahan had sworn that unless his negroes, as he called them, voted at his dictation he would "chop up the ballot boxes," as he expressed it.

Both he and Girod had been Democrats and recently turned Populists, and the planters of this ward were determined that they should not exercise any unlawful influence over the colored vote of the ward.

It is a significant fact that not a single witness, white or black, has been produced who desired to vote for the contestant, and who was either prevented or persuaded from doing so, and while the witnesses for the contestant glibly testify that numerous negroes have told them that they desired to vote for Benoit, they refuse to give their names or to produce the witnesses. If such testimony as this can be considered sufficient to reject the entire poll of a ward, while the voters themselves testify to absolute freedom and fairness, no ballot will be safe from attacks of this character.

The attack on Ward 4 is based on an ex parte affidavit of some 76 parties that they had voted for Benoit, and only 43 votes have been returned for him from that box. These affidavits certainly can not be considered as evidence. The contestee called one of the Populist commissioners at this box, whose testimony will be found on pages 164 and 165 of the record. He swears positively that it was impossible for any change of ballots to have been made, and that none was made. It appears from the testimony of the contestant's witnesses that he was fully represented at this poll; that his friends watched it all day; that the commissioner whose testimony was taken by contestee, E. G. Dewey, was the one who received the ballots; that he at no time was absent from the box; and that it was opened and counted without having left his possession.

Under these circumstances the contention of the contestant that this ballot should be thrown out is not only unfounded but absurd.

In Wards 2 and 5, it appears that the parish supervisors rejected the entire ballot because the number of votes in the box exceeded the number of names carried on the poll list. The law of Louisiana is silent in such contingencies, and in the absence of statutory legislation, we are not advised of any means by which the true result could be reached, nor can we find any authority on the part of this committee to revise the action of the authorities of the State of Louisiana where they have acted within the scope of their jurisdiction. We therefore find no reason to change the returned vote from the parish of Caldwell, which is 467 for Boatner, 318 for Benoit.

Boatner's majority is 157, which, added to his previous majority of 1,020, makes 1,177.

OUACHITA.

The charges against this parish are as follows:

"Eleventh. That on the 6th day of November, 1894, there was held in the parish of Ouachita an election for a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States for the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, and that at and before said election, at and about and in the neighborhood of the voting places of Log Town, in Ward 4; West Monroe, in Ward 5; Grady School House, in Ward 1; Colony, in Ward 2; court-house, in Ward 3, and Compress, in Ward 3, and among those voters whose votes were required by law to be cast thereat, a reign of terror, provoked and kept alive by your political friends and partisans, existed, of such a nature and to such an extent as required a high degree of personal courage on the part of those who voted for me against you, and that, by reason of this fear upon the part of many voters, hundreds were forced to vote for you, many of whom so stated, and against me.

"Twelfth. That by unlawful and other means hundreds of voters were induced to form themselves into so-called Democratic clubs and go through the form of mummery of passing resolutions to vote the Democratic ticket, and vote it openly; all of which I will claim was against their will and wishes, for your friends and supporters well knew that a large majority of such voters would vote for me if permitted to do so, and against you.

"Thirteenth. That white men of known and reputed personal courage and bravery, who were also equally well known as your political friends and partisans, were appointed to be at and remain at each box or voting place, and in plain view thereof, to see that they so voted an open Democratic ticket; and I will claim that you were personally cognizant of the proposed illegalities, and that you made no attempt to restrain the unlawful intents or acts of said partisans; and that, therefore, by reason of threats and fear of personal violence and ostracism hundreds of legally qualified electors were deterred from voting for me, and by these methods "persuaded" to vote for you, and that could a fair and peaceable election have been held at the above voting places in the parish of Ouachita upon the 6th day of November, 1894, the result would have been as follows, to wit:

Boatner	600

The city of Monroe, which is the principal town in north Louisiana, is situated in this parish. It is a thriving and progressive little city with a population of about 5,000 people, and the home of both contestant and contestee.

The returned vote of this parish is:

Boatner	2,548
Boatner's majority	1,906

By reference to the notice of contest it will be perceived that no attack is made on these returns on account of any irregularity, but solely on the ground of intimidation.

His testimony attacks three wards only:

	Votes.
The third precinct of Ward 2	152
The third precinct of Ward 3	558
Twelfth precinct in Ward 10	263
Total	973

Ward 3 and the twelfth precinct of Ward 10 are partially within the limits of the city of Monroe. The witnesses whose testimony is relied on to sustain the charge of intimidation at these polls are E. R. Benoit, brother of contestant; H. Barr, L. J. Johnson, David T. Russell, T. F. Campbell, and contestant himself. We will briefly review the testimony of each of these witnesses.

E. R. BENOIT.

The substance of his testimony is that he saw a negro named H. N. Nelson come to vote. A Mr. Parker walked over with the negro and Mr. Block asked Mr. Parker if the negro had voted right. Parker replied, "Yes; but he did not want to." Parker said something to the negro, who replied, "Yes, sir." Then Parker told the negro to get his ticket for the next world. That is about what he saw at "Compress box," which is the twelfth precinct of Ward 10. Heard negroes say that they wanted to vote for Benoit but were not allowed to. Heard negroes say they did not vote because they were not allowed to vote an open ticket. On cross-examination says:

"I did not say I heard negroes say that they wanted to vote for Benoit but were afraid to. I said I heard some people. Mr. Lynch was one of them."

Also heard one negro named Andrew Lawson say he was going to leave. He was scared to stay. The negro had voted, but witness did not ask him for whom. The only intimidation which it can possibly be claimed as proved by this witness is the negro Nelson, who presumably voted for contestee; the negro Lawson, who presumably voted for contestant, and a white man named Lynch, who said he did not vote because he could not vote an open ticket. It is to be observed that the witness infers intimidation of the negro Nelson, not from anything that Nelson said or did, but from what he said he heard Parker say, that the negro Lawson had not been prevented from voting, and that while he seeks to have it inferred that Lynch did not vote, because he wanted to vote an open ticket, yet the witness himself admits that he had just voted an open ticket without molestation or interference.

H. BARR.

His testimony is substantially embraced in the following question and answer:

Q. What was done at the poll?

A. After 5 o'clock whistle blew a couple of darkies that worked in the shop came to vote. I handed them Benoit tickets and said: "Here's a ticket, Bill." Bill said, "What ticket is it—Benoit ticket?" I said "Yes," and he took the ticket, and him and the other darkey started up to vote. About that time a man pushed between him and I and said, "Nigger, here's your ticket," and they said, "Boss, I have a ticket." He said, "You damned niggers are going to vote for Benoit; they are doing all they can to get you fired at the shops," and John Stevens happened to be standing there; he said: "It's no such a thing; they are firing white men and putting niggers in their places." Now this gentleman spoke up and said: "By God, you are going to vote this ticket." I saw it was getting too rocky for me and I stepped back. I didn't see much more; I left; I saw it was too rocky for me at the poll.

On cross-examination he admitted that he had been at the polls from 1.30 p. m. to half past 5 p. m.; that he voted an open ticket without molestation or interference. It is also to be observed that he could not give the names of parties who, he says, used the language stated by him to the negro voters to whom he had given Benoit tickets.

L. J. JOHNSON.

This witness was a commissioner of elections appointed to represent contestant. He testifies that there was a general demand for the voting of open tickets, yet admits that many tickets were voted folded. He also testified that Dr. A. G. Bowman was near the polls taking down the names of persons who voted. The following examination and cross-examination speaks for itself and requires no comment:

Redirect:

Q. Where did the voters stand?

A. The box was before that door and the voters stood on the outside of the table that stood at the door; the box was on the table.

Q. What part of the court-house?

A. None in the room; the voters were in the hall of the court-house.

Q. In coming up to the door to vote didn't the voter have to pass through a crowd of persons standing in front of the door?

A. Most all day, standing in front of the door there.

Q. Where was the man standing who had the memorandum?

A. Standing up against the door facing in front of the poll.

Q. Was he a Boatner or Benoit man?

A. I guess a Boatner man, Dr. Bowman.

Q. From what you saw and heard at that precinct on that day were the negroes perfectly free to vote for whom they pleased?

A. I think the negroes are too badly scared to vote in this country as they please entirely; they are afraid to vote as they please.

Recross:

Q. Do you mean that with reference to this particular election, or elections generally?

A. Elections generally.

Q. Did you see or hear anything at this poll calculated to make them afraid to vote as they pleased?

A. I do not know the negro's object in wanting to vote a folded ticket; whether they were afraid of one party or the other. White men as well as colored would have their tickets folded when they would come to vote. They were requested to vote an open ticket.

Q. About how many negroes came with folded tickets and were requested to vote an open ticket?

A. Can't answer that question.

Q. Were any considerable number of them?

A. I think most of the persons who went to vote had their tickets folded; all had to be folded to go into the box.

Q. I meant how many people came to vote with tickets in their hands folded to vote?

A. As I was sitting on the inside, I couldn't see.

Q. Who was it that requested them to vote an open ticket?

A. Can't say particularly anyone. It seemed to be the general demand on the outside. The commissioners had nothing to say in the matter.

Q. Did you see any action on the part of the supporters of the contestee (Boatner) that was calculated to intimidate any person and prevent him from voting as he chose?

A. I heard these words: "If you don't vote a Democratic ticket that you must not look to the Democrats for any more favors." I don't know who said it. I heard it on the outside.

Q. You don't know who said it?

A. No, sir; I don't.

Q. What time of day was that?

A. Don't know.

Q. That is all you heard that sounded anything like intimidation?

A. Yes, sir.

Redirect:

Q. You spoke of the tickets having to be folded to be placed in the box. Were they folded up again after being opened?

A. The slot in the box was too narrow for tickets to go in without folding. If they were handed to the receiver and he placed it in the box, he folded it himself.

Q. Did you hear more than one demand that they vote an open ticket?

A. It was a general demand or request to all voters from more than one. I didn't understand that all folded tickets were for one party or the other. I suppose they had curiosity to see who they were voting for.

Q. What effect would the demand or request to vote an open ticket have on negro voters? Would it or not be calculated to intimidate them?

(Contestee objects, as it is calling for the mere opinion of the witness.)

A. Can't give any answer to that question; I don't know.

Q. What effect would the taking down of the names of the negroes and how they voted have upon them?

(Contestee objects on the ground above; also, that the witness has not stated that the manner in which the voters voted was taken down at the polls, witness only having stated that a party appeared to be making a memorandum of the names of those who had voted.)

A. I don't know how to answer that question.

Q. Did you state that these names and how they voted were taken down in that book?

A. I know the names were taken down; I don't think the way the votes were given; I don't know what names were taken.
Q. Were the names of white voters taken down?
A. I think so.
Q. Did you say all voters were taken down?
A. I don't think the memoranda was kept there all day.
Recross:
Q. Was the object of taking those names to keep an account of those who had voted, so as to send for those who had not voted?
A. I don't know; they could have got that information from the poll books; that idea had not occurred to me.
Q. The poll book was not subject to their examination at that time?
A. I think not, it was never asked for, I don't think.
Q. Was it in constant use in checking off the names by the commissioners?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Dr. Bowman is a very peaceable, law-abiding citizen?
A. I believe so.
Q. He is an honorable man and stands well in the community?
A. I think so.
Q. Did he act quietly and peaceably while taking this memoranda?
A. Yes, sir; I think he did.
Q. Do you recollect the proportion of the folded ballots that you found for Mr. Benoit when you counted out the tickets?
A. No, sir; I can't answer that question; don't remember; there were some for both sides, Boatner and Benoit.
It will be noted that the witness says:
"I think the negroes are too badly scared to vote in this country as they please entirely. They are afraid to vote as they please."
On cross-examination, when asked if he meant that with reference to this particular election, or elections generally, he replied: "Elections generally," and gives no single act or fact occurring during this election which could reasonably have the effect of intimidating any voter.
It will be noted as we proceed that all of the witnesses for the contestant at this box referred to the taking down of the names of negroes by Dr. Bowman as an act of intimidation, and we will at this point refer to the testimony of Dr. Bowman, which shows the extent to which this was done and its object and purpose:
Q. It has been testified that on that day (referring to the day of the election) you stood by the Second Ward poll box and took the names of voters. Please state whether or not you did so.
A. I did not.
Q. Please state what you did in and about the polls.
A. Was about the polls off and on all day, and there was one or two negroes—three I believe, that had voted the Democratic ticket and I thought they were voting for Benoit and took their names on the back of an envelope—not for any purpose of intimidation whatever, but to see that they did not participate in Democratic primaries hereafter.
Q. Did you intimidate or attempt to intimidate any colored people or white men of approved personal courage on that day or prior thereto into voting for the contestee (Boatner)?
A. I did not.
By a reference to the testimony of the contestant himself it will be seen that he describes Dr. Bowman as a peaceable and law-abiding man, and one whose veracity can not be questioned.

DAVID T. RUSSELL.

This witness is one of Benoit's warm supporters and, we infer, managers. The following questions and answers give the substance of his testimony:
Cross-examined:
Q. You have stated that you considered the election held on November 6 at the Court-House precinct as notoriously unfair. Please state why. What occurred or transpired to impress you with such an opinion or idea?
A. I have already stated that, I believe. On the day of the election Emanuel Hall came to the polls to vote. He had a folded ticket. Mr. Tom Parker asked him if he didn't know that it was understood that everyone should vote an open ticket. He said he didn't know anything about that; that he wanted to support Mr. Benoit. They tried to make—Mr. Parker and some other gentlemen, several, Tom Parker—him open his ticket. He told them no; he wanted to vote that ticket, and wanted to vote for Benoit; and he put the ticket in the box. Tom Parker said to some gentlemen present, "Can we stand this?" The reply was, "Don't think we can." They caught hold of him and pulled him in the yard and cursed him for a * * * That's all, I reckon.
Q. Did Emanuel Hall vote for Mr. A. Benoit?
A. Yes, sir; he did; he voted a folded ticket, and claimed he was voting for Benoit.
Q. He voted a ticket which he had folded in his hands and which he claimed was a Benoit ticket?
A. He did.
Q. Give the names or name of any white or colored voter who desired to vote for Benoit at the last Congressional election who were refused or denied that right.
A. As I said before, I don't know whether Lawson voted or not; if he didn't vote he was deterred from doing so by the action of Boatner men at this polling precinct. He told me he was going to vote; he came here to vote; I don't know if he voted or not.
Q. You are satisfied if he did vote at all he voted for Benoit.
A. I am.
Q. Then if Andrew Lawson was permitted to vote you don't know of a single instance or individual who was refused the right to vote at the polls as they desired?
A. No; I think all who wanted to vote for Benoit, as far as my own knowledge goes, supported him; voted for him.
Q. Do you know that four-fifths of the white voters in Wards 3 and 10 of this parish were outspoken and pronounced supporters of Mr. C. J. Boatner in the November election, 1894?
A. I can't say what proportion there was; certainly a large majority of the whites were outspoken supporters of Boatner.
Q. Were not the more intelligent and influential negro voters in the town of Monroe supporters of C. J. Boatner at that election?
A. I suppose they supported Boatner; yes, sir.
Q. Where is Andrew Lawson at this time?
A. Monroe, I guess. I have not seen him for three or four days.
Q. Has he not resided here since the election, November, 1894?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Has he been molested or in any way troubled by anyone since the election?
A. I think not.
Q. Has anyone else who supported Mr. Benoit been molested in any way?
A. To my knowledge I know of no one.

T. F. CAMPBELL.

This witness was also a leading supporter of contestant and a commissioner of elections.

Asked to state whether he saw anything in the halls in the front of the polls which intimidated negro voters and interfered with their free exercise of the right of suffrage, he answers as follows:
A. I believe that I saw acts that were calculated to intimidate colored people.
Q. Please state what these acts were and by whom they were committed.
A. There were parties who sat on the edge of the table that would require the voters to vote their tickets open, and if the tickets were not voted open in some cases those gentlemen took the names of the voters down in a notebook, or they were asked to take the names down. They pretended to be writing, or did write, the names. I didn't see the names written. Dr. A. G. Bowman was the party who did the writing. I saw a negro man come to the polls to vote. He had a Benoit ticket. A party asked him to let him see what ticket he had. He took the ticket from the man, looked at it, said, "This is not the ticket you want to vote," and give him a ticket for Boatner. The man told them that he wanted to vote for Benoit. At this time there were several gentlemen talking with the man, and the negro got out of my sight, and he did not vote at this poll. The party who took that ticket was one Walter Lyons. One other instance impressed itself upon my mind was a colored voter came to vote and there were some questions asked him by some one as to what ticket he had. He told them that he had the ticket that he wished to vote. They insisted on seeing his ticket, which I don't believe that they did, but he told them he wanted to vote for Mr. Benoit, and some one spoke up and said, "Let him vote." Dr. Bowman took out his notebook, pretended to be writing his name, or did write it, and remarked, "We will see you later." I saw considerable pulling and hauling and crowding the doorway when voters would come in to vote, which created a good deal of confusion. This lasted pretty much all day. I think in the middle of the noon this interfered so much with the work—questioning voters as to whom they were voting for—that I called the attention of the commissioners and to the people generally that if they did not quit interfering with the voters I could not sign the returns of the election. However, there were some of the same kind of disturbances afterwards. One particular instance that I remember now; there were three or four men came to vote. They, each of them except one, had a Benoit ticket. While one of their names did not appear on the poll book, and while he was gone to look over the registration book the others were surrounded by Boatner's friends, and when they voted they voted Boatner tickets. I believe that is about all I can call to mind at present, only in a general way.
Under the laws of Louisiana the commissioner is a peace officer with authority to invoke the aid of a sheriff and suspend the voting until order is restored. This witness could have exercised that authority. He could also have refused to sign and certify the returns if voters had been unlawfully influenced by intimidation or prevented from voting. He did neither, but signed and swore to the returns.
If offered as a witness in a court of justice these acts would have closed his mouth and prevented him from impeaching as a witness the validity of his act as a public officer. If, however, his testimony be given full force and effect, the extent of it is that he saw a ticket taken from the hand of a negro and another given him, which he voted. He does not state that the voter's act was not voluntary, or that he was induced to accept the ticket which he voted by any unlawful means. His statement that the name of another voter was taken who insisted upon voting for Benoit loses its force when construed with the testimony of Dr. Bowman which we have quoted. If, however, the testimony of all these witnesses be fully credited it proves, possibly, that Nelson voted for contestee when he desired to vote for contestant; that Lynch did not vote at all; that two negroes named by Barr were prevented from voting for contestant, and one referred to by Campbell, making five in all who might, if their contention was correct, have voted for contestant.

ALEXIS BENOIT.

The contestant was sworn in his own behalf, and we print his cross-examination in full, which shows conclusively that his answers to questions on examination in chief were disingenuous, and that he knew no facts on which to base the extravagant statements made in his notice of contest.
Cross-examined:
Q. What year were you admitted to the bar to practice law?
A. 1882.
Q. Have you ever pursued the practice of your profession as a lawyer?
A. I have not.
Q. Who was the prominent colored man that told you he would support you if he could?
A. Elias Johns.
Q. Is he in the city now?
A. He is.
Q. Why didn't you summons him as a witness in this contest?
A. For the reason that he did not want to be summoned.
Q. Did you consult the other witnesses to ascertain if they wanted to be summoned?
A. Some of them; yes, sir.
Q. Did you consult all of them?
A. I did not.
Q. Which of those who were summoned did you consult?
A. Mr. Schultz is one; the gentleman present.
Q. Is he the only other one?
A. I don't know whether I have or not; I talked to all my witnesses.
Q. Did you talk to all of those you summoned?
A. No, sir; I have not.
Q. Do you mean to state by your testimony that Elias Johns was unlawfully prevented from giving you his support?
A. No, I don't; there is my answer to his questions; there is his answer to my questions.
Q. If it was not your object to have an inference drawn that Elias Johns was intimidated into withholding his support from you, why did you put in the two conversations with you—what was the object and purpose of that testimony?
A. The testimony speaks for itself.
Q. Do you decline to state your object in putting it in?
A. No, sir.
Q. Then what was your object?
A. You asked me that the conclusion should be drawn that he was prevented unlawfully from supporting me; I answer that that is my conclusion.
Q. I asked you for your object in putting in the testimony.
A. Yes, sir; that was my object.
Q. Do you know of any unlawful influence brought to bear on Elias Johns to prevent him from supporting you?
A. I can not particularize except the general understanding among the negroes that they had better vote in accordance with the wishes of those—that element who controlled them.
Q. Is that sufficient?
A. If it's sufficient for you, it is sufficient for me.
Q. Is Elias Johns a negro or a mulatto?
A. He is a mulatto.
Q. Does he hold any official position in this city at this time?

A. He is a member of the city council.
Q. How long has he held that position?
A. I think he has been elected three times.
Q. On what ticket was he elected—Democratic, Republican, or Populist?
A. Democratic ticket.
Q. What's his business?
A. He is a drayman; has vehicles for hire; transports goods and merchandise through the city.
Q. Is he a man of property?
A. He is.
Q. You stated a while ago there is a rule in this parish that the managers vote their negro laborors on the plantations in accordance with the wishes of the owners of the plantations. Have you ever attended an election in Ward 4 in this parish?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When?
A. I do not recollect to ever having attended one.
Q. Have you ever attended an election in Ward 1?
A. No, sir; I have not.
Q. Have you ever attended an election in this parish outside of the city of Monroe?
A. I have not.
Q. You say that the planters in this parish disapprove of any electioneering among the negroes on their plantations. Have you ever electioneered on any plantations?
A. I never have.
Q. Has any planter in this parish ever forbidden you to electioneer on his plantation?
A. They have not.
Q. Are there any white men in this town who led you to believe that they were going to support you if you failed to do so?
A. Well, my friends reported to me that this one and that one had said they were going to vote for me.
Q. Did any of those parties fail to vote for you?
A. From the number of votes I received in this city it is evident they did.
Q. Did you receive as many votes as there were members of the Populist club?
A. Yes, sir; I did.
Q. Did you not state just now there were 80 members of that Populist club?
A. Yes, sir; about 80, to the best of my recollection.
Q. Did you receive as many as 80 votes in the two city wards?
A. I received 79 votes.
Q. You were elected a member of the legislature from this parish at the last State election, were you not?
A. I was.
Q. Were you elected as a Democrat?
A. I was elected as an antilottery man.
Q. Did you claim to be a Democrat?
A. I did.
Q. Have you claimed to be a Democrat for the last ten years previous to this election?
A. I have.
Q. Have you voted the Democratic ticket until the recent election?
A. I have.
Q. Did you participate in the Democratic caucus in the legislature of which you were a member?
A. I participated in two or three of them.
Q. Do you know of any intimidation or unlawful influence being used against you in the last election, of your personal knowledge?
A. With the exception of the instance already narrated, I do not.
Q. What instance did you narrate?
A. In the case of the negro Stokes, which occurred at the Compress.
Q. That is the only instance?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You have stated something with regard to the formation of negro Democratic clubs; do you know of any unlawful influence being used to obtain the formation of those clubs?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you know of any unlawful influence being used to obtain the adoption of the resolutions by which the members of the clubs pledged themselves to vote the Democratic ticket and to vote it open?
A. Except the general fact, which I believe to be true, that they did not wish to vote the Democratic ticket.
Q. Is it not a fact that the contestee has lived in the parish of Ouachita for the last fifteen years?
A. It is.
Q. Was there any other name on the Democratic ticket at the last election except that of the contestee?
A. There was not.
Q. Is the contestee personally unpopular with the colored people of the parish of Ouachita and the city of Monroe, so far as you know?
A. I do not think I ever heard a negro express an opinion touching the contestee personally.
Q. Is it not a fact that as a member of the recent—last legislature—you supported a bill amending the election law of the State, for the avowed purpose of disfranchising the negroes?
A. It is not.
Q. Is it not a fact that you, in speeches in the legislature, advocated the disfranchisement of the negroes by changing the election law, which would prevent their voting?
A. I did not.
Q. Is it not a fact that in the election of 1888 you advocated the exclusion of negro Democrats from participation in Democratic primaries?
A. I advocated the elimination of the negroes from politics in Ouachita Parish at that time, from primaries.
Q. Is it not a fact that shortly before the adjournment of the legislature, on a visit to this town, you gave an interview to a reporter of the daily paper published here, in which you charged that a certain measure providing for the funding of a certain class of State securities known as "baby bonds" had been obtained by corrupt means?
(Contestant's counsel objects to the question on the ground it is irrelevant.)
A. I prefer being made his own witness later, for the reason that contestee can later make me his own witness, and then establish such things as he may desire.
Q. Is it not a fact that on returning to the sitting of the legislature and learning that a copy of the paper containing the interview had reached the capitol, that you rose to a question of personal privilege and denied having given such an interview, and thereupon telegraphed to the newspaper, requesting that any comment be withheld until your return, or words to that effect?
(Contestant's counsel objects to this question on the ground that it is irrelevant, not covered by any issue in the contest.)
A. I interpose the same for the same reason.
Q. Did you not state on the floor of the house of representatives, in the remarks which you made on the occasion referred to, that you were the victim of a manufactured interview, or words to that effect?
A. Same thing by witness.
Q. With respect to what you had alleged to be the rule in this parish as to managers controlling the votes of the laborers under their employ, have you spoken of your personal knowledge?
A. I have not; only as a matter of common repute and general knowledge.
Q. Do you mean general knowledge of your own or general knowledge of other people?
A. Of my own and of other people.
Q. Then you state you have a knowledge of these facts yourself?
A. As matters of general repute.
Q. You speak, then, entirely from general repute?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Give the name of the negro that you stated in your direct examination having seen at the Compress polling precinct talking to a young man and the young man trying to induce him to take a Boatner ticket and vote it instead of a Benoit ticket?
A. Stokes; Monroe Stokes, I think, is his name.
Q. You stated that Mr. John P. Parker afterwards took him by the arm and told him to come on and vote. Now, do you know for whom he voted?
A. He voted for Mr. Boatner.
Q. Are you positive of that fact?
A. I am positive for the reason that Mr. John P. Parker, an ardent supporter of Mr. Boatner's, took him to the ballot box and voted him.
Q. Is it not a fact that Mr. John P. Parker told the negro that he could vote for you if he wanted to and to come on and vote now?
A. I did not hear him say so.
Q. Did you see the ballot that Monroe Stokes cast on that occasion?
A. I did not.
Q. Was he not the same negro referred to by you in your direct testimony as the one who stated that he had previously tried to vote at the court-house precinct and was not permitted to vote there?
A. He was.
Q. You were an ardent supporter of Governor Foster's in the last State election, were you not?
A. I was.
Q. And was elected to the legislature from this parish on what was known as the Foster ticket, were you not?
A. The Foster antilottery ticket.
Q. Was that ticket denominated a Republican, a People's, or a Democratic ticket?
A. Both factions claimed to be the Democratic party.
Q. You were an active participator in the two primaries held in Ouachita Parish prior to the State election in 1892?
(Contestant's counsel objects to all these questions on the ground that they are irrelevant.)
A. I was.
Q. Were not those two primaries and also the State election in April, 1892, the most exciting elections held in the parish of Ouachita during the past twelve years and up to the present time?
A. Except the recent election upon the whisky question, they were.
Q. What acts of violence or demonstrations calculated to intimidate were committed of your own knowledge in this parish at the Congressional election held on November 6, 1894?
A. With the exception of the Stokes affair, I have no knowledge.
Q. In the convention that assembled at Monroe and by which you were nominated as the People's Party candidate for Congress from this district, was not a campaign fund raised or promised by the delegates or members of said convention to you in an amount aggregating more than $1,000?
(Contestant's counsel objects to this as irrelevant and not pertinent to any issue in this case.)
A. There was not.
Q. State the amount, as nearly as you can, that was pledged to you on the occasion inquired about.
A. About $400.
Q. Did you not hear the speeches made in that convention by R. H. Ward, one Hester, and one old, gray-headed man from Union Parish?
A. I heard Mr. Hester's speech only.
Q. Do you know whether Judge A. A. Gunby, Dr. Wm. Sandel, and E. T. Lamkin were present during the proceedings of that convention, and also C. H. Trousdale?
A. They were; some for a few minutes.
Q. Did you not hear part of as many as two speeches in that convention by the delegates, in which speeches they declared they would march to victory with their party and platform of principles if it necessitated their resorting to their shotguns and rifles?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you not hear that speeches of that character were made in that convention?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you not hear R. H. Ward and a very elderly gentleman, whose name I don't remember, declare that when they had accomplished their purpose in Louisiana they would then march to Alabama with their shotguns and rifles and see that the People's Party officers would be installed?
A. I did not hear any part of Ward's speech, nor do I remember to have heard any other speech except by Mr. Hester, jr., of Union. I was absent while those speeches were being made, with the committee on resolutions, who had sent for me.
Q. On the day after your nomination did you not say, in the presence of R. B. Blanks, C. H. Trousdale, and E. T. Lamkin, that you had suffered yourself to be made a fool of by accepting the nomination, giving as your reason therefor that you didn't have the remotest chance of being elected at the approaching election?
A. I have no recollection of such a statement.
Q. Will you state that you did not make such an assertion at the time and to the parties mentioned in the previous question?
A. I will not.
Q. Is it not a fact that you frequently stated, and to various parties, in Monroe, Ouachita Parish, that you hadn't the faintest idea of being elected, but that you couldn't refuse the nomination after it had been tendered to you twice and the convention which tendered it having promised to defray all campaign expenses?
A. Yes, sir; that was part of my programme.
Q. Why is it that you have only alleged and charged fraud and intimidation in the parishes and at the precincts in the Fifth Congressional district where majorities were cast in favor of the contestee?
A. For the reason that those are the only parishes in the district in which such a charge would lie.
Q. Do you know of your own knowledge how elections are conducted in the parishes of Jackson, Lincoln, Union, and Claiborne?
A. Only from general repute.
Q. Have you ever been present and attended an election in either of the parishes above inquired about? Is it not a fact that you have made no complaint against the methods employed in the conduct of November elections at any precinct in the Fifth Congressional district which returned a majority for you?
A. It is.

Q. Why is this?
A. For the reason because no information reached my ears of any irregularities at those precincts.
Q. You have displayed a great deal of energy and activity, have you not, in endeavoring to ascertain any irregularities at the precincts which returned majorities against you, have you not?
A. To the extent of my means and ability I have.
Q. What efforts, if any, have you made to ascertain whether or not there were any irregularities or intimidations or frauds committed in the parishes of Jackson, Lincoln, and Union?
A. None whatever, for the elections in these parishes are not complained of.
Q. Have you not said that there was fraud committed in those parishes and other hill parishes in the State election held in April, 1892, and but for which Foster would never have taken his seat as governor of Louisiana?
A. I have not.
Q. Have you not stated that Foster was the product of fraud?
A. I have no doubt I have.
Q. In the last State election, and at which you were elected a member of the legislature, did you not receive a hearty support of the late Captain Tibbles and L. D. McLain?
A. I did.
Q. Did not the planting partnership of McLain & Tibbles, as it then existed, employ and control as many colored voters or more than any other two planters in the parish of Ouachita?
A. They did.
Q. Do you know for whom the colored voters employed by McLain & Tibbles voted for for the legislature in that election?
A. I do; they voted for me.
Q. Did you make any objection to the influence which these planters exerted in your behalf at that election?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you make any canvass of the parish in that election?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you make any canvass of the parish in the last election?
A. I made three speeches.
Q. At what points?
A. Pine Grove, Calhoun, Monroe.
Q. Pine Grove and Calhoun are west of the river, in the hill parish, are they not?
A. They are.
Q. Did you visit the parish of East Carroll in the late campaign?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you visit the parish of Tensas?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you visit the parish of Concordia?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you visit the parish of West Carroll?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you visit the parish of Richland?
A. I did.
Q. At what point in that parish did you speak?
A. Delhi and Rayville.
Q. Who gave you the information of the alleged intimidation at Rayville and Girod, in the parish of Richland, in the recent election?
A. Col. A. B. Cooper for Rayville; Capt. J. Mat Riley for Girod.
Q. Did you summon either of those parties as a witness in this contest?
A. I summoned Captain Riley.
Q. Do you mean by Captain Riley, Col. J. Mat Riley?
A. Capt. J. Mat Riley; yes, sir.
Q. Why did you not summons Col. J. B. Cooper?
A. Because he stated that at his box in his precinct the election was fair, but that he had been informed that such a condition prevailed at and about Rayville.
Q. Col. J. Mat Riley resides in this parish?
A. He does.
Q. You summoned him to appear in Rayville, did you not?
A. I did.
Q. Why did you not summons him to appear here?
A. I did not know at that time that the law required, or the rule, that a witness should be summoned in the parish in which he resided, but presumed he had to be summoned in Richland, as the complaint was made there.
Q. Didn't you learn the existence of that rule before the issuance of the summonses for the investigation in this parish?
A. No, sir.
Q. When did you learn the existence of that rule?
A. A day or two ago, after the investigation had been had.
Q. Why did you postpone the investigation of alleged frauds in this parish (Ouachita) until the 25th of this month?
A. For the reason that it was not convenient for my attorneys to take testimony earlier.
Q. You have applied for an extension of time on the ground that the quarantine regulations of several parishes prevented your attorneys from entering them to attend the investigation. Why did you not, during that period, when it is claimed your attorneys could not attend in other parishes, proceed with the taking of testimony in this parish (Ouachita)?
A. We had not; I had not settled upon the names of all the witnesses.
Q. When did you settle on the names of all the witnesses?
A. To-day one week ago.
Q. You summoned Mr. John W. Johnston, Mr. E. C. McGee, Mr. A. S. Brown, John P. Parker, and several other witnesses who reside in the country; why have you put none of them on the stand except Mr. Ransom and Mr. Cahn (Cann)?
A. For the reason that it was evident that the time to examine all witnesses would not be sufficient; therefore I deemed it best to examine those with whose testimony I would be somewhat familiar.
Q. You summoned Mr. F. H. Cann from the Fourth Ward; you knew he was a supporter and a political and personal friend of contestee; why did you not summon one of your own supporters from that ward?
A. Because I did not know the name of anyone of my avowed supporters who remained at the polls the day of the election.
Q. Did you have any avowed supporter in that ward?
A. I was told I had two.
Q. Did you make any effort to communicate with them, or did you communicate with them with regard to the conduct of the election in that ward?
A. I did not.
Q. Did you have any reason to believe that the negroes of that ward would support you as a matter of choice in preference to the contestee?
A. Only the general belief that they would vote for anyone who promised or who it was believed would be able or endeavor to change the present financial condition of the country.
Q. And you think the negroes of that ward were advised and informed that you would effect such a change, or attempt to do so?
A. I judge they believed that I could not make it any worse.
Q. Upon what do you base that opinion?
A. The pressing need of a change of conditions.
Q. Was that opinion formed from intercourse or conversation with them, or just a general inference which you drew yourself without it?
A. It is drawn from the fact of conversation with negroes generally.
Q. Did you converse with any from the Fourth Ward?
A. I do not know.
Q. Are you informed as to whether the negroes as a class supported you in the three parishes which returned majorities for you?
A. I am not.
Q. Are you advised or aware that your popular supporters in the hill parishes attempted by violence and intimidation, and in many instances succeeded, in forcing the negroes residing there to support you?
A. Never heard of it.
Q. I observe that you summoned Mr. John C. Ransom from the Fifth Ward of this parish; were you not aware that Mr. Ransom was a supporter of the contestee?
A. I was.
Q. Have you not quite a number of active supporters in that ward?
A. I received about 80 votes in that ward.
Q. Is that the only means of information you have of the support given you in that ward?
A. Oh, I know the names of gentlemen who supported me.
Q. If such a reign of terror existed in that ward, as well as in other parts of the parish, as to prevent a free and fair election, why did you not summons some of your supporters to prove it?
A. My most ardent supporter at that box was a commissioner of elections, and therefore I thought would be unable to testify.
Q. Who was he?
A. Maj. J. H. Flournoy.
Q. Is he the gentleman who contributes to the newspapers on the subject of free silver and the general degeneracy of all political parties except the organization ycleped the People's Party?
A. He frequently writes for the newspapers.
Q. Do you mean to say that this reign of terror existed only on the day of election?
A. I mean what my allegation contains.
Q. The question is, What does your allegation mean, in your judgment—what idea did you intend to convey, that this reign of terror existed only on the day of election or preceded it?
A. Upon the day of election, and perhaps one or two days preceding it.
Q. If it preceded it, why would Major Flournoy being a commissioner of election prevent his having knowledge of the fact?
A. He is an old man and does not stir around much.
Q. Is he the only white supporter you had in that ward?
A. He was not.
Q. Why did you not summon them?
A. Because I did not wish to.
Q. Are you well acquainted with John C. Ransom?
A. Quite well; I have known John for about eight on ten years.
Q. Is it not a fact that he was an actual supporter of yours for election to the State legislature?
A. He was.
Q. What is his character for truth and veracity?
A. Very good.
Q. Is he not a man of high standing and integrity in the community?
A. He stands very well in his community.
Q. Would you doubt the truth of any statement which he would make under oath?
A. I do not think I would.
Q. Did you hear his testimony given on yesterday?
A. I did.
Q. After having heard his testimony, do you still allege that the election in the Fifth Ward was influenced by intimidation?
A. Well, yes, sir; I still claim my allegations are true.
Q. You, then, claim that Mr. Ransom has testified falsely, do you?
A. I do not claim any such a thing. Mr. Ransom testified to the best of his knowledge and belief as far as his own observation was concerned.
Q. If, then, Mr. Ransom being a witness from the Fifth Ward, and having testified that he was an active participant in the election, and that there was neither force nor fraud, so far as he knew of or heard of, be true, upon what evidence do you rely to maintain your assertion that the voters of the Fifth Ward were intimidated, at least a majority of them, into giving the contestee their support?
A. I have no other witness from that ward.
Q. You have known Capt. F. H. Cann a number of years?
A. I have.
Q. Is he a gentleman of high standing and character in this community?
A. He is.
Q. Would he, in your opinion, make a false statement under oath or otherwise?
A. He would not.
Q. Would you not place implicit confidence in any statement which he would make as being within his own knowledge?
A. I would.
Q. Are you acquainted with Mr. John P. Parker?
A. I am.
Q. What is his reputation for truth and veracity in this community?
A. Mr. Parker is president of the Planters' Oil Company, vice-president of the Monroe Grocery Company, and he is interested in other large and successful business enterprises, and is therefore a man who stands well in the community.
Q. I asked about his reputation for truth and veracity.
A. I never heard it questioned.
Q. Would you not implicitly accept his statement under oath about any matter of fact?
A. I think I would.
Q. Don't you know you would?
A. I have never had occasion to doubt Mr. Parker's word; never had any transaction with Mr. Parker of any consequence; don't think I ever had any transaction with him in my life.
Q. You have known him a long time?
A. Yes, sir; I have.
Q. And his character for truth and veracity is not questioned in this community?
A. I have not heard it questioned.
Q. Are you acquainted with J. W. Johnson?
A. I am.
Q. State his standing and character in this community.
A. I am not very well acquainted with him; so far as his character is concerned I know nothing bad about him.
Q. Would you not accept his statement under oath to any matter of fact implicitly?
A. I have no reason to say otherwise.
Q. That does not exactly answer the question; it is easy enough to say I have never heard it questioned. The question is, Whether or not his standing in this community and his conduct since you have been a member of it that you or any other citizen here would accept his own statement without question?

A. I had not known Mr. Johnson a great while very intimately, but from what I know of him I answer that question in the affirmative.

Q. Are you acquainted with A. S. Brown?

A. Slightly.

Q. How long has Mr. Brown been a resident of this parish?

A. I do not know.

Q. Has he not been a resident of it at least ten years?

A. I don't know; I think about seven years.

Q. Do you not know that he was manager up on Mr. Stubbs's Magenta plantation as early as 1883?

A. I do not; it's been so long I may have forgotten. I do not——

Q. You do know, however, that he was a supporter of yours when you were elected a member of the legislature, do you not?

A. I think he was.

Q. From your knowledge of Mr. Brown's character in this community, would you not accept any statement of fact made by him under oath as true and correct?

A. I know almost nothing about Mr. Brown; I never had five minutes' conversation with him in my life that I remember, nor with others about him.

Q. Do you know what his reputation for truth and veracity is in this community?

A. I never heard it asked about or questioned.

Q. Did you ever hear it impeached in any way?

A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know Mr. E. C. McGee?

A. I do.

Q. How long have you known him?

A. Two years, I think.

Q. Don't you recollect knowing Mr. McGee longer than two years?

A. He may have been here earlier, but I don't think I formed his acquaintance until about two years ago.

Q. What is Mr. McGee's reputation in this community; is it that of an honorable man and a gentleman?

A. He is known as an all-around good fellow.

Q. That don't answer the question. I want to know his reputation as a reliable man and a gentleman.

A. I think that is his reputation, though I have never heard this question discussed or mentioned; never heard his character assailed.

Q. Would you doubt the truth of any statement of fact which he would make under oath?

A. I would not.

Q. Are you acquainted with W. D. Munholland?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he a reputable lawyer of this city?

A. I don't know, sir.

Q. Is he a gentleman of standing and character here?

A. Mun stands very well.

Q. Would you doubt any assertion he would make under oath?

A. I don't know him well enough. I am not intimately acquainted with Mr. Munholland.

Q. Do you know anything about him that would give ground to suppose he would testify otherwise than truthfully?

A. I do not.

Q. I will ask you the same question with reference to C. T. Madison?

A. I make the same answer.

Q. Are you acquainted with Mr. T. M. Parker, manager of the Planters' oil mill?

A. I am.

Q. Would you doubt the truth of any statement which he would make under oath?

A. I don't know that I would.

Q. Don't you know that you wouldn't?

A. I have no reason to know I wouldn't; never had any dealings with Tom in any way in my life.

Q. What is his reputation in this community for truth and veracity; is it good or bad?

A. Never heard it mentioned.

Q. Are you acquainted with E. J. Ficken, manager of the Union oil mill?

A. Slightly.

Q. Is there anything against his reputation for truth and veracity in this community?

A. I don't know anything about him or his truth and veracity.

Q. Are you acquainted with Uriah Millsaps, of West Monroe?

A. I am.

Q. Is he a gentleman of truth and veracity?

A. I think he is.

Q. Peaceable, quiet man?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Man of high standing in this community?

A. He doesn't live in this community; he lives immediately across the Ouachita River.

Q. Is he not a man of high standing and character in the society of Ouachita?

A. Mr. Millsaps is a successful business man. Further than that I know little or nothing touching Mr. Millsap's character.

Q. You have charged in your contest that a reign of terror existed in this parish just prior to and on the day of election, which prevented a free and fair election. Who inaugurated that reign of terror?

A. I do not know.

Q. Who were the principal actors in it?

A. The allegations contained in my notice of contest are based upon the general knowledge that planters claimed the right to vote their negroes against me, and that others, irrespective of their connection with the farming interest, were likewise prevented from voting for me.

Q. This, then, is the sole foundation for that charge?

A. I think it is sufficient.

Q. It is not a question of sufficiency; it is one of fact. Are you aware of any act of violence or threats, either by individuals or by associations, to intimidate either white or colored voters prior to the day of election?

A. Aside from the facts already detailed, it is; aside from the answers in my testimony, I have no other knowledge.

Q. Then you know of no other acts or means used, except the influence of the planters and their managers, to procure the support of their colored labor for the contestee being used to bring about this reign of terror to which you referred in your answer?

A. That is all.

Q. Is it not a fact that a large majority of the white voters of this city voted for the contestee in the recent election?

A. It is.

Q. Do you charge now, under oath, that they were at all influenced unlawfully in giving their support?

A. I charge that there was a moral coercion, the pressure of which numbers of those who wished to vote for me could not withstand.

Q. How was that coercion brought about?

A. The banks and bankers were against me; most of the other large institutions; the corporations were against me.

Q. You attribute your defeat to the influence of the money power of this parish?

A. I do not attribute it to that source exclusively.

Q. You do not claim these institutions to which you referred and classes to which you referred—that is, that of bankers and moneyed men—were coerced or intimidated?

A. I do not.

Q. What supporter, if any, did you have in Ward 1 at the recent election who could act as commissioner of election?

A. I do not know.

Q. What supporter or supporters did you have who could have served as commissioners of election as your representative at the Filhiol schoolhouse, in Ward 10, and at the Logtown precinct, in Ward 4?

A. I do not know; Mr. Whited and some other friends of mine looked after the matter; I was absent and couldn't.

Q. Is it not a fact that you did not receive a vote at either of the two precincts last inquired about?

A. I don't know, but I think I got none. I do not know. I do not think I got any.

Q. Who are your general counsel in this contest in this district?

A. Gunby & Sholars.

Q. Do they reside in the city of Monroe?

A. They do.

Q. Were either or both of them in the parish of Ouachita for two weeks following the 14th of February, 1895?

A. I do not know.

Q. You don't know whether either one was here during that period--that is to say, two weeks after the 14th of February last?

A. I presume they were in the city; I do not know.

Q. Did you know where the contestee was during the months of January and February?

A. The presumption was you were in Washington.

Q. Do you receive a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

A. I do.

Q. Did you read the proceedings of the last session of Congress?

A. Occasionally.

Q. Did you not know from reading that RECORD that the contestee was in attendance on the sittings of the House of Representatives?

A. No; no roll call.

Q. You saw no roll call recorded?

A. There is no daily roll call.

Q. There were roll calls almost every day, were there not?

A. I was so busy with my contest at that particular time that I paid less attention to the proceedings of Congress than I ordinarily do.

Q. Were you not perfectly aware at the time you caused service of the notice of contest to be made at the residence of the contestee in this city that the contestee was in the discharge of his official duty in Washington City, attending the sittings of the House of Representatives?

A. The presumption is you were there.

A. BENOIT.

[SEAL.] W. H. LUZENBERG, N. P.

We call especial attention to the following excerpts from the testimony of this witness:

Q. Is it not a fact that a large majority of the white voters voted for contestee?

A. It is.

Q. Do you charge now under oath that they were at all influenced unlawfully in giving him their support?

A. I charge that there was a moral coercion the pressure of which numbers of those who wished to vote for me could not withstand.

Q. How was that pressure brought about?

A. The banks and bankers were against me; most of the other large institutions. The corporations were against me.

If the majority of the committee is of opinion that the existence of such a moral coercion as is here described by the contestant renders an election void, it would be necessary, in order to carry that theory into effect, to declare void the election of a very large part of the membership of this House, as it is charged by the Populist party that the "money power," so called, not only controls the election of a majority of both branches of Congress, but dominates and controls their action afterwards. That so absurd a contention should have received any favor at the hands of the majority of this committee is a matter of great surprise.

Against this testimony the contestee arrays that of the following witnesses who were at the polls during the day, having gone there to vote, and who had ample opportunities for observation, and who emphatically deny the statements made by contestant: Dr. J. B. Searcey, pastor of the Baptist church; Rev. A. Heinberg, rabbi of Temple Sinaii; Rev. Josiah Jones, Rev. R. B. Vincent, and Rev. William Hamilton, pastors in charge of the negro churches; Hon. W. N. Potts, district judge; H. H. Russell and F. G. Hudson, attorneys; H. Randall, Dr. A. G. Bowman, J. M. Breard, D. A. Breard, E. Neuwirth, E. C. McGehee, E. I. Ficken, George W. Stewart, member of the Republican executive committee of the district; F. W. Barrington, principal of the colored high school; Elijah Jones, Sandy Bird, Henry Barnes, W. G. Head, D. C. Hill, Charles Horton, and Abram Ray, the last eight being prominent negroes, who emphatically and positively deny the charges of violence and intimidation, and affirm that the election was free from undue excitement or unlawful influences. These negroes testify that contestee was popular with the negroes, and that as a class they supported him in preference to the contestant. They are evidently the leaders of their race in this locality, and we can imagine no legal reason for discrediting their sworn statements.

Added to this is the testimony of George W. Stewart, who appears to be a stanch Republican, and who makes the following statement:

George W. Stewart, a lawful witness, sworn:

Q. You live in this parish?

A. I do; in the city of Monroe.

Q. How long have you lived in the parish?

A. I came on the 4th of July, 1873.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. I am a carpenter by trade.

Q. How old are you?

A. Sixty-three years old.

Q. Do you know Mr. Benoit and Mr. Boatner?

A. I know both of them.

Q. What is your politics?

A. I am a Republican.

Q. Have you recently held any Federal position; if so, what?

A. Superintendent of construction of the United States post-office and courthouse here during Harrison's Administration.

Q. Who was the choice of the Republicans of this parish in 1894 as between Benoit and Boatner?

A. Mr. Boatner; I can tell you that as one of the members of the executive committee.
Q. Are you a member of the Republican Congressional executive committee for this district?
A. I am.
Q. Was there much excitement in the conduct of the November election in 1894?
A. None whatever among us about it. No excitement.
Q. Did you vote at the election?
A. I did.
Q. In your opinion, was it peaceable and fair in this parish?
A. There never was a more peaceable or fairer one.
Q. Mr. Benoit charges in his notice of contest that but for the intimidation practiced upon the white and colored voters of this parish by the friends and supporters of Colonel Boatner he would have received 2,590 votes at that election and Colonel Boatner would have received 600. What's your opinion in regard to that charge?
A. He wouldn't have gotten it on this side the river; don't know anything about the other side.
Q. Is not the principal voting strength in this parish on this side the river?
A. It is.
Q. At any fair election in this parish do you think Benoit would receive more votes than he did get at the election in November, 1894, under any circumstances?
A. I don't think he would.
(Objected to as calling for the opinion of witness.)
Q. Do you know or have you heard of the existence in this parish at and prior to the election in November, 1894, of any reign of terror or systematic intimidation practiced by the friends and supporters of Boatner?
A. I have not heard of any—in the last two Congressional elections the Republicans supported Boatner of their own accord.
Q. Is Mr. Benoit popular with the colored people in this parish?
A. I don't know.

Cross-examined:

Q. Did you state that throughout the Fifth Congressional district, or in the parish of Ouachita, the Republicans supported Boatner against Benoit?
A. I said they supported Boatner.
Q. I ask you in Ouachita Parish or throughout the district?
A. In Ouachita Parish.
Q. How many Republicans, white, in Ouachita Parish?
A. In and around Monroe there is between 40 and 50.
Q. Name some of those who supported Colonel Boatner against Benoit?
A. I was not at the ballot box; I went there to vote, but I advised all Republicans, as a member of the executive committee, to vote for Boatner, but I didn't stand at the poll to see they did.
Q. You can't say of your own knowledge that anyone voted for Boatner against Benoit except yourself?
A. That is all.
Q. Have you received any favors at the hands of Boatner since he has been a member of Congress?
A. No, sir; never asked for any.
Q. Did you solicit his support when you were an applicant for the position (Federal) about which you testified?
A. No, sir; never solicited anybody's support.
Q. Are you now an applicant for any Federal position?
A. None.
Q. Have you been?
A. When the Alexandria post-office was given out I applied for it as a mechanic, not as a politician, and didn't get it.
Q. Colonel Boatner indorsed your application, didn't he?
A. I don't know; I told him I was going to apply for it; I didn't tell him I was going to ask him, or did ask him, to indorse it.
Q. You didn't solicit his influence?
A. No, sir; never solicited his influence, never asked him to do anything for me, except to get me a copy of the pension laws. I applied for the post-office here as a mechanic, not as a politician.

GEO. W. STEWART.

[SEAL.] W. H. LUZENBERG, Notary Public.

It would lengthen this report unreasonably to quote the testimony of the large number of witnesses produced by contestee in rebuttal of contestant's charges. The supplement to the record, however, will show that the witnesses heretofore named negative contestant's assertions. Among them we find the freight and ticket agent of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, the general attorney for the same company, the attorney for what is known as the Queen and Crescent Company, the pastor of the Baptist church, the district judge, the manager of the Union Oil Company's mill in that city, and several prominent planters.

Among the negroes sworn in behalf of contestee are three who are pastors of the colored churches, the superintendent of the colored schools, an ex-member of the State legislature, two members and one ex-member of the city council, the city constable, who has held that office for a number of years.

We quote from the testimony of one of these witnesses named Charles Horton, who seems to have been a very intelligent man:

Q. Did you vote at the election November 6, 1894?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you observe any disturbance or intimidation at the poll boxes?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you hear or know of any violations or coercion of white or colored voters at or prior to the November election, 1894?
A. No, sir.
Q. It is charged by contestant that in the parish of Ouachita a reign of terror was inaugurated by the friends and supporters of Mr. Boatner at and prior to the November election, 1894, which prevented a fair election and deterred and intimidated a large number of voters, white and black, into voting for Boatner who would otherwise have cast their ballots for Benoit. Did any such condition of affairs exist in this parish?
A. No, sir.

Cross-examination:

Q. You have stated here that the colored people preferred Mr. Boatner to Benoit. How many did you talk with about it? Name them.
A. William Hamilton, R. Benson, Abe Ray, Adam and Jack Irvin, Richard Thornton, Taylor Jones, John Reed, Dave Hines, Moses Lee, Ed Outz, Bunkey White, Tony Lee, Walter Outz, Henry Barney, George Henderson, William Henderson, Robert Jeems, Mose Culpepper, Tom Williams, Wash Powell, and can call more than that if you need.

Contestant intimated in his testimony that Elijah Johns, a prominent negro, had told him that he would support him if he could. Contestee called Elijah Johns as a witness, and his testimony is found on page 16 et seq. of the supplement to the record. He has been a member of the city council four times, making eight years in all. His testimony is as follows:

Q. Have you been supported as a member of the city council by the white people of your ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you vote at the last Congressional election?
A. I did.
Q. Was any violence or threats made to coerce your action in regard to the Congressional election?
A. None.
Q. How long have you known contestee?
A. Ever since he came to Monroe.
Q. Have you supported contestee in any previous Congressional elections?
A. I have voted for him at every election.
Q. It is charged by contestant that there was a reign of terror created in this parish prior to the last election by the friends of the contestee which was so violent that it prevented all the colored people and a large number of the white people from supporting the contestant, Mr. Benoit. Do you know anything of such a reign of terror?
A. No, sir.
Q. It has been stated by Mr. Whited that you told him you would support Mr. Benoit if you could. State what conversation you had with Mr. Whited on that subject.
A. After the nomination of Mr. Benoit I met Mr. Whited on the street. He said that Mr. Benoit had been nominated, and he wanted me to go to work for him. I said, "Yes, sir." He drove on and there was no more said.
Q. Did you tell Mr. Whited that you would support him unless you were forcibly prevented from doing so?
A. It was not my intention.
Q. What was your object in making that statement to him?
A. Merely to pass him by.
Q. Did you wish to avoid a controversy?
A. That was about it.
Q. You have stated that you voted for the contestee. Did you vote for him because he was your choice or because unlawful influence was brought to bear on you?
A. It was my choice.
Q. So far as you know from association with the colored people of this city, is it your opinion that those who supported Boatner did so because he was their choice or because they were forced to do so?
A. Because the contestee was their choice.
Q. It is stated by Mr. Benoit in his testimony that you also told him that you would support him if you could. State what conversation you had with him, and whether you led him to infer that you would support him if not prevented from doing so.
A. I met Mr. Benoit about the Rackett Store. He said, "Old man, I have been nominated and I want you to support me." I told him, "I will if I can."
Q. What was your object in making that statement to him?
A. I did not have any particular object.
Q. Was there anything to prevent you from supporting him if you wanted to do so.
A. Nothing.

Cross-examination:

Q. Do I understand you to say you do not know what their political preferences (referring to negroes) were between Boatner and Benoit?
A. All that I know was that Mr. Boatner was their preference.
Q. How do you know that in the last election?
A. From my association with the colored people, they all speak well of Mr. Boatner. He is the Representative of this district for about six years, and I voted for him every election, and it is my idea that he is the preference of the others.

JOSIAH JONES:

Q. From your knowledge of your neighbors, the colored people especially, is it your opinion that they voted according to their choice in the last Congressional election?
A. So far as I know, they voted of their own opinion.
Q. Is there any hostility among the colored people of this parish to contestee; I mean by hostility, unkind, bad feeling?
A. No, sir; not within my knowledge.
Q. Do you know of any threats, violence, or intimidation resorted to by the friends of the contestee, Mr. Boatner, to secure the votes of either white or colored people for him?
A. I do not.

This man is the owner of the farm on which he resides. (See record, pages 14, 15.) It will thus be seen that the contestee has resorted to the very best evidence of which the nature of the case is susceptible. He has in the two parishes of Ouachita and Caldwell taken the testimony of the parties said to have been intimidated, while the contestant has not called in either of these parishes a single witness who had been at all interfered with in the exercise of the right of suffrage.

The attack on the Second Ward of this parish rests on the testimony of Samuel Whited. He is contradicted by W. T. Oaks, D. D. Johnson, J. W. Johnson, and E. E. McGehee. The character and credibility of these witnesses is vouched for by the contestant in his testimony in this case.

There is testimony in the record to show that the negroes usually, almost invariably, vote with their employers, and did so in the last election. We entertain no doubt but that this is the fact, but there is not the slightest evidence in the record to show that any unlawful means were used to influence them to do so. If it be the fact that they prefer to cooperate with their employers and take their advice in preference to that of interested politicians and office seekers, we know of no law or reason for interfering with that choice or denying them the right to cooperate politically with whom they please. We therefore conclude that the contestee is entitled to the full returned vote of this parish, which gave him 1,906 majority.

MOREHOUSE.

The charges against this parish are as follows:

"That on the 6th day of November, 1894, in the parish of Morehouse, an election was held for a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States for the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, and that throughout said parish a reign of terror existed of such a nature and to such an extent as to deter hundreds of legally qualified electors from voting at all, and causing others to vote for you and against me, contrary to their wishes, and that all or nearly all of those who voted for me did so over threats and by daring such consequences of bodily harm as they had reason to fear would be inflicted or attempted to be inflicted upon them.

"That legally qualified voters, who were known to be my friends and supporters, were 'waited upon,' some by night, others in the day, and warned to desist from upholding my candidacy for such Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, and to remain away from the place or places where the voting was to be done, all of which outrages upon the rights and liberties of free men were perpetrated by your Democratic friends and partisans, and all of which was evidently premeditated, inasmuch as one of your principal supporters, in a speech delivered at Bastrop, in the said parish, in October or September, 1894, made the following statement: 'If we (meaning your political friends and supporters) can not control the negroes any other way, we can bulldoze them or count them.' In consideration of all which I shall claim that the votes received by you in said parish should be rejected and not counted for you, and that fully 400 legally qualified electors were deterred from voting for me by unlawful means and forced to vote for you who otherwise would have voted for me, and should therefore have been counted for me, and that an honest election and an honest return thereof would place the result in said Morehouse Parish as follows, to wit:

Boatner	291

The vote for this parish is:

Boatner	691
Boatner's majority	310

The testimony attacks the Tenth Ward only, which gave contestee 26 votes, and in our opinion sustains the charge of intimidation at that poll, which we reject, and which, deducted from Boatner's returned vote, leaves his majority 284. There is not the slightest proof against any other ward or poll in this parish.

RICHLAND PARISH.

The charges against this parish are as follows:

"That at an election held in the parish of Richland upon the 6th day of November, 1894, for a Congressman to represent the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States of America, 300 electors who had been provided with tickets bearing my name for said office were put in fear and made to relinquish the same, and to accept in lieu thereof tickets bearing your name for said Representative, with the injunction to 'vote or take the consequences,' which consequences, it was understood, would be disastrous to those who dared to vote for me; that these unlawful and reprehensible proceedings occurred at the voting places of Rayville and Girard, or near thereto, and at these places threats and intimidation was resorted to to deter and prevent those who wished to vote for me from doing so, and to force them to vote for you, all of which was done by your political friends and supporters and partisans. I shall therefore insist that, could a fair and peaceable election have been held at the said voting places of Rayville and Girard, and true return made thereof, the vote of Richland Parish for said Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress, at the election held upon the 6th day of November, 1894, would be as follows, to wit:

In support of these charges contestant took the testimony of six witnesses, none of whom sustain them.

FRANKLIN.

Contestant charges:

"That on the 6th day of November, 1894, in the parish of Franklin, there was held an election for a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, and that at the voting places in the First, Second, and Fourth wards in said parish gross frauds and other irregularities were committed of such a nature and to such an extent as to require in fairness to me and in justice to the people of this district that 280 of the votes polled at the voting places in such wards be thrown out, rejected, and not counted for you and against me, as they have been illegally and wrongfully done.

"At one of the said places one of my supporters who wished to exercise his lawful right to witness a count of the vote was forcibly ejected from the room and violently beaten with sticks, etc. I will therefore claim that 280 of the votes counted for you thereat should be rejected, and not counted for you and against me. In consideration of which the vote of Franklin Parish at said election was and ought to be as follows:

It will be observed that only two polls in this parish were attacked—the Second and Fourth wards—one because one of the supporters of contestant, who wished to witness the count, was said to have been forcibly ejected from the room and violently beaten with sticks, and at the other the commissioners of election failed to swear to the returns.

The testimony of S. H. Cordill, to be found on page 184 of the record, explains the personal recounter with Mr. Benoit's supporter. It seems that he was an interloper, a man who had just come to the country, not a citizen of the ward or parish, and came over to Ward 3 to run the election. Cordill testifies as follows:

"There were two men sent from Winnsboro, in Ward 7, for the purpose of running the election in Ward 3 in favor of the Populists. Neither one of those persons were voters in that ward. The people of that ward told them that they could get along without their assistance, and told them to leave, and they left. This was about 10 o'clock in the day. They attempted to coerce the colored people to vote the Populist ticket, and the white people would not submit to it. The fact that their being forced to leave did not have any effect on the result of the election, and did not change the result thereof. If those people had remained there quietly, and not attempted to coerce the colored people to vote their way, they could have remained there quietly all day and nothing would have been done. From that time on the people voted as they pleased. There was no fraud practiced in the counting or returning of the votes. I assisted in the counting and returning of the votes.

"Mr. Boatner is very well and favorably known in that ward. Mr. Boatner was the choice of a large majority of the people of that ward. Mr. Benoit is very little known in that ward; no one out there is acquainted with him. There was no organization of the Populists in that ward, and it was considered that there were no Populists there. There was no objection made by the commissioners to anyone voting the Populist ticket if they wanted to. There would have been no disturbance at that poll if those two outsiders had not come there and created it. The only objection was that Mr. Scramblin, one of the outsiders and no voter, attempted to coerce one Brown Buckner to vote the Populist ticket, and Buckner told the commissioners that he wanted to vote for Mr. Boatner. Scramblin took hold of his hand and wanted to put the ticket in the box. The commissioners objected to his so doing, and ordered him to desist, and ejected him from the room. From that time on there was no disturbance, and everything passed off quietly.

"S. H. CORDILL."

W. B. Osborn, another witness, accounts for the difficulty in this way:

"Everything passed off smoothly until about 10 o'clock in the day, when one Mr. Scramblin, who had been sent there and who was not a voter at said precinct, attempted to coerce the colored people to vote the Populist ticket against their will. The said Scramblin attempted to force one Brown Buckner to vote for Benoit. He took said Buckner by the hand and attempted to force him to deposit a Benoit ballot in the box. Said Buckner informed the commissioners of election that he did not want to vote for Benoit, but that he wanted to vote for Mr. Boatner. Whereupon the commissioners ordered Mr. Scramblin to desist and let the people vote for who they pleased, which he refused to do, upon which refusal he was ejected from the room. The disturbance caused by this had no effect upon the result of the election at said ward."

There was no further disturbance. The election passed off peaceably.

The same facts are testified to by I. S. Osborn and a number of other witnesses.

As to Ward 4, the facts as stated by the commissioner are that they were duly sworn before opening the poll; that they made out their returns according to the law, except they did not think it necessary to swear to them and did not know that one of the commissioners had the right to administer the oath to the others. They all agree that the vote was returned exactly as cast and that the election was perfectly free and honest. Upon this point there can be no difference of opinion.

We are of opinion that contestee is entitled to the full returned vote from this parish.

WEST CARROLL.

"That at an election held in the parish of West Carroll, upon the 6th day of November, 1894, for a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, your political friends and supporters for a period of three days immediately preceding such election, with arms, traversed a large portion of said parish, engaged in the wrongful and fraudulent and unfair business of taking by force or fraud tickets having my name printed upon them for Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress away from legally qualified electors who desired and intended to vote for me, and compelling them to accept tickets upon which was printed your name for said office, warning such electors by threats and fears of violence that they must vote for you; and that many of whom did not vote, were counted and returned for you, wrongfully and illegally, by your political friends and supporters.

"I shall therefore claim that all the votes returned for you at said election in said parish were fraudulent and should be rejected and thrown out, and that 200 of them should have been allowed to vote for me and so returned. In consideration of which the vote of said parish of West Carroll should have been returned as follows, to wit:

Boatner	89

Contestant, after making such charges, summoned a number of witnesses and repaired to the parish site of that parish to take their depositions, but on arriving there declined to have any of his witnesses sworn, and took no testimony. The returns show, however, that a clerical error in addition of 100, to the prejudice of contestant, was made. This was conceded by contestee, and the returns from that parish corrected accordingly:

Boatner's returned majority is	384
From which deduct (error in addition)	100
Leaves his majority	284

EAST CARROLL.

The charges are as follows:

"That at an election held in the parish of East Carroll, upon the 6th day of November, 1894, for a Representative in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana, the various commissioners of election were not required to and did not take the oath required by law to make due and honest return of the election by them held, and that they signed blank returns of an election and forwarded the same to Lake Providence, the parish seat of said parish, and that these blank returns were there filled out and forwarded to Baton Rouge, the State capital, for official promulgation as being the actual vote of said parish; that these wrongs and frauds upon the rights of American citizens were perpetrated by your political friends and partisans.

"I shall therefore claim that the 2,004 majority returned for you from this parish is wholly fraudulent and illegal and should be rejected and not counted for you, and against me, and that a proper and honest count of said parish would be—

Boatner	0

The evidence in support of contestant in this parish is the opinion of C. F. Davis and William Rouse, that the returns are fictitious, and the testimony of J. S. Guenard, the register of voters, who leaves it in doubt whether there was any lawful registration in that parish. The statement of Davis and Rouse is reenforced by the testimony of R. L. Hill, so far as the returns of Lake Providence are concerned, who swears that very few people were in the town on the day of election. On this testimony it is asked that the entire polls of the parish be excluded. In the opinion of your committee the testimony is entirely insufficient to do so.

MADISON.

"That at an election held in the parish of Madison, upon the 6th day of November, 1894, for a Congressman to represent the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States of America, there were returned for you 1,968 votes and for me 55 votes, while upon the day of said election the number of voters whose names are required by law to be upon the books of the registrar of the voters of said parish as a prerequisite to voting was only 1,038; but that your political friends and partisans wrongfully and fraudulently returned for you, as having been actually cast, 1,968 votes.

"I shall therefore claim that the vote of said parish for you is so tinged with fraud that it should be rejected and thrown out and not counted for you; and that many votes were cast for me which were not returned because of the fraudulent practices of your political friends and supporters which should be counted for me, and that upon a true return of the election the result would have been as follows, to wit:

In this parish the testimony of the register of voters discloses the fact that the returned vote exceeds the registration. Hence from a legal standpoint, as the constitution of Louisiana forbids or restricts the right of suffrage to the voter who is lawfully registered, it being impossible to distinguish between those who lawfully voted and those who did not, we exclude the vote from the parish entirely.

TENSAS.

"That upon the 6th day of November, 1894, in the parish of Tensas, the form of an election was gone through for a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana; that blank returns of such purported election were filled out in St. Joseph, the parish seat, and forwarded to the State capital for official promulgation as the legal and honest vote of said parish, when in truth and in fact no legal or other election had been held; that these unlawful and fraudulent acts were committed by your political friends and partisans.

"I shall therefore claim that all the votes returned for you from said parish should be rejected and thrown out, and not counted for you and against me, which would leave the returns from said parish blank.

"That at an election, or pretended election, purporting to have been held upon the 6th day of November, 1894, in the parish of Concordia, for a Congressman to represent the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana in the

Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, no election was really held, but that in accordance with the usual custom in the 'four river parishes' blank returns were signed by the commissioners and filled out at the parish seat and forwarded to Baton Rouge, the State capital, for official promulgation, purporting to be the returns of an election at which you received 2,009 votes and I 20, when, in truth and in fact, no lawful election had been held; but that if such an election could have been held and true, correct, and lawful return thereof made, the result would have been as follows in said parish of Corcordia:

"That at least the vote of the entire parish should be rejected and thrown out and not counted, because of the illegal and fraudulent practices aforesaid. All of which was done and committed by your political friends and partisans."

In this parish the record shows that none of the returns were sworn to—that is to say, that the commissioners of election wholly failed to make affidavit to any part of the returns, and under the view which we have heretofore expressed we deem it safer to reject these returns.

A review of the testimony shows that in the parishes of Claiborne, Lincoln, Jackson, and Union the election was not questioned. We have shown that in the parish of Catahoula two wards only should be rejected; in Caldwell, none; in Ouachita, none; in Morehouse, none; in Richland, none; in Franklin, none; in West Carroll, none; in East Carroll, none; and in Concordia, 7 polls, leaving unquestioned wards in which more than a majority of the votes polled in the parish were cast.

Under these circumstances we energetically protest against the conclusion of a majority of the committee that the 16,000 voters of the district who voted for one or other of the candidates should be disfranchised and denied the right of representation by the member who received the majority of their suffrages, because of frauds and irregularities insufficient to change the result, and for which they are in no manner responsible.

If permissible at all to declare an election void, it could, in our judgment, be legally done only in extreme cases where, by violence, widespread and concerted intimidation, and fraud, it would become impossible to eliminate the lawful and voluntary vote from the unlawful and fraudulent, and that which had been cast under the influence of fear.

In this case not only do such conditions not exist, but if every poll attacked by contestant, and against which he has adduced any evidence, be excluded from the count, contestee still has a majority of 327; but giving the evidence fair consideration, and excluding only the vote which is shown to have been fraudulent and intimidated, contestee's majority is 5,188.

We subjoin a statement of the true vote of the district as shown by the official returns and evidence contained in the record, from which it appears, after eliminating all fraudulent votes, rejecting all returns not made according to law, giving the contestant the benefit of the doubt on all questions of law and fact involved in the record, he is defeated by the majority above stated. We therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That C. J. Boatner was elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and is entitled to his seat as such."

Respectfully submitted.

J. W. BAILEY.
J. G. MAGUIRE.
J. C. KYLE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time allowed by the order of the House has expired, and under the order——

Mr. TAYLER. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended ten minutes, which will equalize the time occupied by the two sides.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended ten minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not object to that if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] be allowed ten minutes more; otherwise I object.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman from Ohio has already had additional time. I hope objection will not be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I hope that no objection will be made to the gentleman from Louisiana stating his case. To the ear of justice the slightest syllable of truth is precious. We on our side have a majority here large enough to vote down anything that we want to vote down, and it does seem to me that in the interest of fair play——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question is not debatable.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am not debating it, but only making an appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. THOMAS. The time allowed under the arrangement having expired, I move that both the contestant and the contestee be allowed ten minutes in addition.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to ask whether the time allowed to the other side was not extended ten minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that ten minutes additional be given to the contestant and the contestee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PITNEY. One question before the gentleman from Louisiana proceeds. Does he seriously contend that the resolutions offered by the majority of the committee ought not to be passed?

Mr. BOATNER. I do not want to say anything in derogation of the agreement with my friend from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER]——

Mr. PITNEY. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] himself has by his own agreement put it out of the power of the House to seriously and deliberately consider this question, I must decline to vote upon it.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that an answer to the gentleman from New Jersey would be a violation of the agreement that I should not enter into debate. I certainly contend, most earnestly and seriously, that the record in this case shows that if every fraudulent and fictitious vote attacked by the contestant be thrown out, I am still elected, and if there be a fair application of the testimony my majority is over 3,000.

Mr. PRINCE. As a member of the committee I wish to state that it was agreed——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. I wish to say for the information of the House that the majority of the committee are prepared now to state, if this House wants to hear them, the reasons for making this report. We seriously contend that the report of the majority is in accordance with the evidence in this case, in accordance with the facts, and in accordance with the law; but in order to accommodate the contestee, so that this matter might be disposed of to-day, such disposition being desired by him with reference to the special election to be held, and because if each one of the six gentlemen constituting the majority of the committee should speak upon the question the debate would occupy the whole of to-morrow, if it did not extend into the next day, we have refrained from speaking. But if gentlemen think that because we are thus closing our mouths we are yielding this question, we desire to say to the House that we are prepared to sustain this majority report by the law, by the evidence, and by the record in this case.

Mr. PITNEY. Permit me to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PITNEY. I am not making any complaint except that the parties, for their own convenience, have put the House in the position of being called upon to vote on a question concerning which it has no adequate information. I must decline to vote.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not for the convenience of the parties, but for the convenience of the people of the district.

Mr. PITNEY. I make no complaint as to that.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Under the circumstances, how can we do otherwise than vote according to the report of the majority?

Mr. BOATNER. I hope that the time which has been occupied in this colloquy will not be counted against me. I trust the gentlemen of the committee agree with me that I was compelled to answer the question which was propounded; otherwise I should not have said one word outside of the report.

[Mr. BOATNER resumed the reading of the minority report.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (before the reading was concluded). The time allotted to the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. BOATNER. I will ask unanimous consent for permission to finish the reading of the testimony of this single witness.

Mr. TAFT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it possible?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes for ten minutes the contestant in this case.

Mr. BENOIT (the contestant). Mr. SPEAKER AND GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: I thank you very much for the privilege you have accorded to me of being heard on the floor of the House in defense, not so much of my own right to a seat in this body, but in defense of the rights of every honest voter in the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana. I can not tell you much of the election in question within the ten minutes accorded to me, but I will try to tell you all that I can, in the brief time allowed, of the condition of one of your sister States of the Union, and the way elections are held in Louisiana. And I desire to say at the outset that I shall not make a single statement that is not fully verified by the record in this case, or that is not well known as a part of the political history of my State.

There are two reasons why I should speak only the truth in regard to this question. The first is that I love my State as you love yours, and I would not willingly trail her fair banner in the dust before this honored assemblage of the representatives of the American people; and in the second place, I know that I must go home and meet face to face the very men whose outrageous crimes and wrongs against free government I expect in the ten minutes allotted to me to denounce.

Now, let me call your attention briefly to my notice of contest and the answer of the contestee to the same. I alleged therein that there had been frauds practiced in the elections in the four river parishes of East Carroll, Madison, Concordia, and Tensas, and that no legal election had been held, and that none has been held for years in those parishes, to the prejudice of the good people of the other portions of the State as well as to the injury of the reputation of the State itself. The contestee, Mr. Boatner, files an answer to the notice of contest and not only denies these allegations but denounces them as false; and yet, gentlemen, when he comes into this court before the committee of the House of Representatives what does he do? He acknowledges in his supplemental brief, filed before the Committee on Elections No. 2, that over 6,000 votes received in these parishes ought to go out because they were unsworn to and are fraudulent.

Did I tell the truth or a falsehood when I alleged that the free electors of the State of Louisiana were disfranchised; that they had been disfranchised by the insertion of fraudulent votes, and by practices which we know have prevailed for years in elections in these river parishes? Boatner himself, in his race for Congress against King, made the fight upon the sole issue that the vote of the river parishes was fictitious and fraudulent.

But one more statement, Mr. Speaker. The contestee in this case said in his supplemental brief, and has called attention to it in his statements some moments ago, with reference to matters in Concordia Parish, that the returns of the elections were all sworn to. A careful reading of the testimony of the clerk of the court (see testimony of Mr. Gillepsie, record, page 82) shows that not one of these returns has been sworn to. The lists of voters were not sworn to in any single ward of those wards wherein he claims 936 votes, and thus carries the whole parish of Concordia.

This is the way these ballot-box stuffers proceed. They deposit in bulk a given number of straight Democratic ballots, regardless of, and with no relation to, any actually cast ballots by actual voters, then count them out and swear that there were so many votes received by the Democratic candidate; but they are careful not to swear, as required by law, by affidavit attached to the poll list, who cast the said votes or that any of them were cast by actual voters at all. Therefore I say, and the record bears me out, that there are some four or five hundred names attached to these Concordia Point returns as having voted the Democratic ticket and for the Democratic candidate, the poll lists for which precincts are not in any one single instance verified by the affidavits of the election officers, as required by law, showing what electors had actually voted. They simply took the ballots that were deposited in the box by themselves, the election officers, and then they counted out so many votes for the Democratic candidate. That is the way that elections are conducted down in my part of the State of Louisiana. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have a great mass of other startling facts to which I had wished to call the attention of the House, but I can not do so in the brief time allowed me. For instance, in Ouachita Parish Boatner claims I attack only three wards for intimidation, and claims that I could not produce proof as to any others because he claims I had not alleged anything against them in the notice of contest. This is not true. My notice charged intimidation, frauds, etc., specifically against 5 of the 10 wards in the parish, and also attacked the entire parish for the results of the same, and for the reign of terror due to past intimidations. And yet the contestee attempts to make out his case either by admitting the very things that I alleged or by attempting to prove things which were not alleged in his answer. I show, in these wards which I attack because of intimidation, that the returns show 1,162 votes that were not sworn to by the election officers. The poll lists were not sworn to, as the printed record proves, and yet he says, "I have attempted to go through this contest and show the true state of the votes cast." Can you believe him? Certainly not any longer than will be required to enable you to read the printed record.

Gentlemen, I wish I could refer briefly to this testimony and impress upon you the importance of some one getting this floor and fixing upon the attention of everyone in this country the facts as to the methods which have prevailed in election contests in Louisiana for years. I have not time to quote the testimony, but let me give you an example. To show you the far-reaching extent of the intimidation which is practiced in some of these parishes, in Ouachita, for instance, I prove by contestee's witnesses that all colored men were expected to vote open tickets; they know there is not one negro in one thousand that will vote the Democratic ticket if he can vote another without incurring the risk of being thrashed or hung by bulldozers. [Laughter.] I tell you, gentlemen, I have lived all my life among them. I was nursed by a good old black mammy. I know them, and I tell you that I never saw but one Democratic negro in my life, and he was to the manor born, or he would not have been a Democrat; and he was brought upon the stand by Boatner; his name was Barrington. Read his testimony, on pages 8 and 9 of the supplemental record. Yet they come here and would have the members of this House believe, and would have this nation believe, that the colored men in that district are just dying to vote the Democratic ticket. [Laughter.] Why, gentlemen, the poor darkey knows he is apt to die or be whipped if he does not vote the Democratic ticket. That is the real reason why they are such good Democrats. Take the testimony of Hill there in Ouachita Parish. What does he testify? Supplemental record, pages 22 and 23:

Q. What did you do on election day?
A. I might say that I performed the duties assigned to me.
Q. And what were those duties?
A. To go around in the Tenth Ward and notify the voters to come to the polls and vote.

And this is about the way that duty is performed:

They send a bulldozed colored man around to tell the other colored men to come and vote. I wish I had the time to give you the dialogue that would take place between these colored men. I will do so briefly: This colored runner, who is sent out by the bulldozers to tell the darkies to come up and vote, rides up or walks up to a colored man's house, and he says, "Niggah, doan' you know dis am 'lection day?" "Cose I does." "Well, why doan' yo' come up and vote, den?" "'Cause 'taint me votin', it's anudder man votin' me." "Well, mister ——— tole me to come down heah to tell yo' if yo' doan' come up dar and vote dey'd make it pow'ful sickly foh yo' roun' heah to-night."

That is the message he gets. Then he pricks up his ears.

"Did Mr. ——— say dat?"

"Yo' hearn me, didn' yo', niggah?"

"Melissa, whah's my hat? I'se gwine up dar right now."

So they come to the polls, gentlemen, and vote the Democratic ticket, and vote an open Democratic ticket, because they are not allowed to vote any other way since the election of 1892, when allowed to vote a secret ballot between rival Democratic candidates—lottery and antilottery. The negro's love for Boatner, a lottery man, did not prove strong enough that year to save his candidates, for the secret ballots of the negroes were cast against his candidates, and Ouachita Parish gave a majority for the antilottery ticket.

That is the real condition of affairs there. But much of the blame for existing conditions, the results of triumphant frauds, must rest upon others higher in power and position than Boatner. Governor Foster is responsible largely for them. By his acts and influence he, in 1894, prevented the enactment of election laws intended to remedy and prevent many of these crimes against suffrage. He is credited with saying in a public speech at Ruston, La., that as governor he was the commander-in-chief of the Democratic party, and that during his incumbency of that office he did not intend to see the government of the State and its machinery turned over to any other party, or words to that effect.

Now, gentlemen, I fasten this upon individuals high in official station, rank, and power. Mr. Boatner, the contestee, himself was a party to this "open ticket" business, for I proved that in a public speech delivered in Monroe, La., the evening before election. He said, addressing the galleries, in which there were 500 or 1,000 colored people: "Now, we want everybody to vote open tickets to-morrow, so as to know who are Democrats." Let it be remembered that this advice was a direct violation of the secrecy of the ballot guaranteed by the State constitution.

Yes, they knew if they were not made to vote the open ticket Benoit would get hundreds of votes where, under these circumstances, with an open ballot, he would get none.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that this Fifth Congressional district is divided by a line which runs almost through its center, the Ouachita River. It is divided into a distinctively white section of country and a distinctively black section of country. In the black section the blacks outnumber the whites by from 5 and 10 to 1. Now, I want to call your attention to the fact that in these white sections, where the election was fair, where the returns are not questioned, I beat Mr. Boatner in nine-tenths of the precincts, so I have carried every part of that district except the one—the black section. [Applause.] But of course, gentlemen, if I should go to the Ouachita River from this white belt with 1,000,000 votes, there would come from the black belt a million and a half against me just as regularly as election day rolls around and the returns are sent in. Hence you realize the utter helplessness of the people in those white sections, where the elections are reasonably fair and honest returns are made, as long as thousands and thousands of fictitious, fraudulent votes can be sent up by a few men as having been actually cast in the black sections. The good, honest voters of that district who are desirous to have their will registered by honest returns for the candidate of their choice are powerless, because, as is held in this case against me, inasmuch as they do not constitute more than one-half of the legal voters of the district, and because the fraudulent and fictitious votes cast out by the committee outnumber the honestly cast and returned vote, their voice must not be heard in your body.

But it seems it is not so, except in Louisiana, as the following showing clearly demonstrates:

Here is the record of the voters now represented in this House by the sitting members representing the seven Congressional districts of Mississippi:

Total average population to district		184,000
Total average number of voters to district		35,000
First district:
Allen	2,977
Brown	843
Second district:

Total vote on Congressmen in State		38,773

I want to say that I am intensely proud of these 6,000 loyal men who stood by me in this contest. The returns only show 5,994, but God knows how many I got that were never counted for me, and so it is fair to take the other 6 and call it 6,000. [Laughter.] I would that I could provoke a storm of indignation which would sweep down from every corner of our common country and, finding its center in Louisiana, hover over her until the eyes of all the world were focused on these travesties upon elections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENOIT. I should like to have about three minutes longer.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes longer.

A MEMBER. Extend his time ten minutes.

Mr. MOODY. I ask to modify that, and request the House to give unanimous consent for an extension of ten minutes for the contestant, and that the same length of time be given to the sitting member.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That C. J. Boatner was elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and is entitled to his seat as such.

Mr. BAILEY. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The resolution recommended by the minority of the committee was again read, as follows:

Resolved, That C. J. Boatner was elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and is entitled to his seat as such.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 132, not voting 164; as follows:

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee, Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, requested me to state that he was called out while the discussion on this case was going on and could not return. If he were here, he would vote "nay" upon this proposition and would vote "yea" upon the main resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of that statement, I desire to withdraw my vote, because I agreed to pair with the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I voted, forgetting that I had agreed to pair with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted with the understanding that if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] should return to the Hall during the roll call my vote should stand; otherwise it was to be withdrawn, as I am paired with him.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. RICHARDSON, is paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK]. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I am paired for the day with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES]. If he were present, I would vote "nay" on this resolution.

The following-named members were announced as paired on this question:

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts with Mr. TUCKER.
Mr. MEIKLEJOHN with Mr. TALBERT.
Mr. WOOMER with Mr. STOKES.
Mr. LACEY with Mr. SWANSON.
Mr. GILLET of New York with Mr. MEREDITH.
Mr. HULICK with Mr. RICHARDSON.
Mr. HENRY of Indiana with Mr. LAWSON.
Mr. HARMER with Mr. SPARKMAN.
Mr. SOUTHARD with Mr. SPENCER.
Mr. DINGLEY with Mr. TURNER of Georgia.

Mr. BINGHAM with Mr. RUSK.
Mr. MAHON with Mr. OTEY.
Mr. FAIRCHILD with Mr. HART.
Mr. HATCH with Mr. COX.
Mr. HOOKER with Mr. MINER of New York.
Mr. HUBBARD with Mr. ABBOTT.
Mr. DAYTON with Mr. DOWNING.
Mr. DOVENER with Mr. LOCKHART.
For the rest of this day:
Mr. LOW with Mr. CUMMINGS.
Until further notice:
Mr. TRACEWELL with Mr. HENDRICK.
Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana with Mr. BAILEY.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there was no valid election held in the Fifth Congressional district of the State of Louisiana on the 6th day of November, 1894, and that neither Alexis Benoit nor Charles J. Boatner is entitled to a seat in the Fifty-fourth Congress as Representative from the Fifth Congressional district of Louisiana.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. TAYLER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLER. Mr. Speaker, I thought that unanimous consent had been given to print the majority and minority reports in the RECORD, but I understand that it does not so appear in the stenographer's notes, and I now ask that unanimous consent be given.

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if that was not the understanding.

Mr. TAYLER. That was the understanding and I thought that consent had been given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that the report of the committee and the views of the minority be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 98) directing the Secretary of War to submit a plan and estimates for the repairs and maintenance of the harbor at Stillwater, Minn.;

Joint resolution (S. R. 99) authorizing the immediate use of a portion of the unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for construction of canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, in construction of protecting walls necessary to the opening of said canal and locks to navigation; and Joint resolution (S. R. 103) directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates of cost of further improvement of Providence River and Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills and resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2221) for the relief of settlers on the Northern Pacific Railroad indemnity lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 1862) to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeals in regard to fees and costs, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1864) to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeals in regard to cases arising under the revenue laws, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1169) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue Springfield rifles to each State and Territory for the National Guard thereof in exchange for other rifles now held—to the Committee on the Militia.

A bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 1211) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to contract for the purchase of a lot of land opposite to the Gosport Navy-Yard—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2272) to fix the salaries of the chief justice and judges of the Court of Claims—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 2141) to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company"—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in paper cover 2,000 additional copies of Notes on the Year's Naval Progress, General Information Series, No. XIV, prepared by the Office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies shall be for the use of the office of Naval Intelligence, Navy Department—

To the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 140) directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and submit an estimate for a breakwater in Marquette Bay; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 141) directing the Secretary of War to submit plans and estimates for the improvement of Fairport Harbor.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROSIUS, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COX, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MAHON, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCDEARMON, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COCKRELL, for the evening session.

To Mr. WALSH, for the evening session.

The House then, on motion of Mr. DALZELL (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. HOPKINS, as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Clerk read clause 2 of Rule XXVI, as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar pursuant to the special order.

Mr. BISHOP. Before that motion is put, I wish the chairman of the committee [Mr. PICKLER] would allow us to take up the bill (H. R. 3292) granting an honorable discharge to Seth Porter Church, alias Samuel Church. That is the unfinished business, and I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. PICKLER. I can not consent.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PICKLER, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

JANE WEBSTER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2621) to increase the pension of Jane Webster, widow of Joel Webster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Jane Webster, widow of Joel Webster, a former wagonmaster in the volunteer militia service of the United States during the war of the rebellion, at the rate of $20 per month, and payable from the 23d day of January, 1883, the date of the death of the said Joel Webster by reason of disability incurred while in the service of the United States; such pension, so granted, to be in lieu of any pension that may have been heretofore allowed and paid to the said Jane Webster.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2621) to increase the pension of Jane Webster, widow of Joel Webster, late wagonmaster of the United States Army, to $20 per month, having considered all the facts and circumstances in this case, beg leave to report:

This bill as amended grants a pension of $12 a month to Jane Webster, widow of Joel Webster, deceased. The husband served in all three years as a civilian employee in the Quartermaster's Department. The widow filed a claim for pension, and it was rejected upon the ground that the husband was not an enlisted man or in the military service. The evidence shows that Joel Webster was at Lexington, Ky., with his wagon train when John Morgan made an attack upon the train, and in the fight that ensued, and while in defense of the Government's property, he was wounded by a saber stroke over the head. From this wound he became insane, and continued so until his death in 1883. The widow is now 83 years old and very poor.

Your committee recommend that the word "twenty," in line 7, be stricken out and "twelve" inserted, and as amended that the bill do pass.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. As I understand, the amount proposed to be paid under this bill to this widow is the amount which she would receive under the general law if her husband had been regularly enlisted as a private.

Mr. PICKLER. That is my understanding. I did not happen to be present in the committee when this bill was acted on.

Mr. LAYTON. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in lines 8 to 11, the words "and payable from the 23d day of January, 1883, the date of the death of the said Joel Webster by reason of disability incurred in the service of the United States."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad if the gentleman who has this measure in charge would give us a more extended statement of the case than is contained in this very brief report. As I understand, this bill is an attempt to place a civilian employee of the Government on an equality with an enlisted man. To say the least, the evidence in such a case ought to be full, clear, and explicit before we act favorably upon it. I therefore trust that we may have some explanation not brought out in the report concerning what would seem to be the weak points in this case. Possibly they are susceptible of satisfactory explanation.

Mr. PICKLER. In regard to the words which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAYTON] proposes to strike out, I presume they were inserted by the committee on account of the advanced age of this woman, 83 years. I shall not resist the adoption of that amendment, although I think it would be no more than ordinary justice that this woman, in view of her age, should receive a pension from the date of the death of her husband. I do not wish, however, to be understood as favoring in general the payment of back pensions or arrears of pensions.

In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN], I will say that it seems to me this report exhibits the whole case. It states that this man was an employee of the Quartermaster's Department, and according to the report—

The evidence shows that Joel Webster was at Lexington, Ky., with his wagon train when John Morgan made an attack upon the train, and in the fight that ensued, and while in defense of the Government's property, he was wounded by a saber stroke over the head. From this wound he became insane, and continued so until his death, in 1883. The widow is now 83 years old.

This bill makes no new departure, establishes no new rule. Ever since private pensions have been granted, wherever a teamster or other person employed in the Quartermaster's Department, or in fact, I think, employed in the Army in any capacity, has actually been wounded—has incurred disability from wounds received in the service—he has been recognized as entitled to the right of pension equally with a soldier. I do not think the practice in these cases has gone further than I have just stated. The rule has been applied simply in cases where the man has been regularly enlisted, and has been clearly proved to have incurred disability by reason of wounds received in the service. Cases of this kind have not been very numerous; and I do not remember that these pensions have ever been granted in any other case than where wounds have been actually received. This widow is the widow of such a person as it has been our practice to pension under these circumstances. The case involves no new departure. It follows the practice of Congress for years and years.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent.

Mr. PICKLER. Certainly.

Mr. LAYTON. I notice that this is a bill entitled "A bill to increase the pension of Jane Webster, widow," etc. Now, has she had a pension granted to her before, or is that simply misleading?

Mr. NORTHWAY. The report shows that her claim was rejected.

Mr. PICKLER. As I said, I was not present when this bill was considered by the committee; but my understanding is that if this bill is granted in the shape it is drawn there would be no deduction for anything received heretofore.

Mr. LAYTON. That is precisely the purport of my amendment. The bill is entitled "to increase the pension" of this woman. If I understand the status of the case, she could not have been pensioned under the general law, because her husband was not actually in the service as an enlisted man.

Mr. PICKLER. My understanding is that there is no pension being received, and I think the title ought to be amended.

Mr. LAYTON. My amendment, the committee will observe, is not in opposition to the bill at all, except as to this portion of it which I have moved to strike out, commencing on the eighth line and terminating with the eleventh, in the following words:

And payable from the 23d day of January, 1883, the date of the death of the said Joel Webster, by reason of disability incurred while in the service of the United States.

In other words, the committee will observe that the bill, in the shape it is drawn, places the old lady on the pension rolls, to which I do not object, and not only increases the pension from $8 to $12 a month, which perhaps he would be entitled to receive under the general law, but makes the pension retroactive, and permits the receiving of the pension from 1883.

Mr. PICKLER. If the gentleman will allow me amoment.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KERR] who reported this bill, desires that I shall ask unanimous consent that it be re-referred to the committee. There are some facts which are not fully understood and which the committee desires to reinvestigate.

Mr. LAYTON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LACEY. This bill was reported in the last Congress and was on the Calendar. That ought to enable the committee to know all about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection; and the bill was ordered to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the committee.

WILLIAM F. GOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1634) to grant a pension to William F. Good, Company L, Tenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William F. Good, late of Company L, Tenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month

Mr. WOOD. Let the report be read, which gives clearly all of the facts.

The report (by Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1634) to grant a pension to William F. Good, Company L, Tenth Indiana Cavalry, submit the following report:

The evidence submitted to the committee shows a remarkable state of facts.

Claimant joined Company L, Tenth Indiana Cavalry, and was enrolled some time later. The date he joined the company was probably December 29, 1863. He was with the company, doing duty and drawing rations and clothing. His brother was first lieutenant of the company. In March, 1864, in a railroad wreck near Gallatin, Tenn., the said company being on train, Henry Good, his brother and first lieutenant, was mortally injured, and claimant ruptured, from which he is now suffering. Claimant was not able to go on with his company, but remained with his brother until his death, caring for him as best he could. He then went home to Columbus, Ind., and claims was never able to return; that his officers informed him that his staying at home till he was fit for service would be all right.

He claims to have been mustered about February 10, 1864. Neither the records of the Adjutant-General's Office at Washington or Indianapolis show that he was ever mustered. The records of the War Department show him to have been enrolled February 3, 1864, and that he deserted January 4, 1864. The official records of the adjutant-general's office of Indiana show him to be enrolled February 3, 1864. The War Department, United States, determined December 11, 1894, that the soldier, not having been mustered, was not in the military service of the United States, and the Pension Office rejects his claim because he was not in the military service of the United States, which was affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The grounds of rejection, as given to claimant, was no pensionable disability. The Secretary of the Interior directed that claimant be notified of true grounds. Meantime claimant filed a mass of evidence proving his disability one-half.

Your committee recommend the bill be amended by striking out "twelve" from last line and insert "six."

This claimant is without relief from the Adjutant-General's Office. He is regarded as never having been in the service, hence no charge of desertion could be removed, if, indeed, there is any, which the committee doubt. The only relief he can get is under this bill.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. I would like to ask the gentleman who prepared this report, why it would not be simpler, instead of pensioning this man, to correct his military record first?

Mr. WOOD. I will answer the gentleman that this matter to which he has referred, suggested itself to the subcommittee having the bill in charge. But there is no record of desertion against this soldier. The roll in the Adjutant-General's Office shows him to have been enrolled on the 3d day of February, 1864, and then there is entered on the record a statement that he deserted on January 4, 1864, one month previous to the date of his enrollment, a manifest error. The error is apparent on the face of the record.

After this record was filed the committee obtained a statement from the adjutant-general's office of Indiana (there is no record of desertion against him there) showing no additional facts in the case. Gentlemen who are acquainted with the way these rolls are made up know that they were made in duplicate or triplicate, one copy of which went to the Adjutant-General of the Army, the other to the office of the adjutant-general of the State, and the other was retained by the regiment or company. Evidently there has been a clerical mistake somewhere; perhaps it was made in the office of the Adjutant-General, or perhaps by the officer in command of the company, for it is evident that this man could not have deserted a month before he was enrolled.

Now, in regard to the particular facts connected with the case, there is absolutely no information of record excepting what is stated in the report, and there is no relief to the soldier except through the action of Congress. He was enlisted, was uniformed, rations were drawn for him, he went upon duty, but had never been mustered. While on duty it appears that a train of cars on which was his company was wrecked. His brother, a first lieutenant in the company, was mortally wounded, and he himself was ruptured. Thus it can be easily seen how his officers may have told him to go home and return to the company when he was fit for service. He never had been mustered, and the War Department has decided that not having been mustered he was never in the military service. The Pension Office, following the conclusion arrived at by the Adjutant-General or the Secretary of War, refused to pension him because he was never in the United States service, when, in point of fact, he received his injury while wearing the uniform of the United States and while in the service as a United States soldier. There was no occasion for him to return until he got fit for duty, because it is very evident that so long as he was in that condition a mustering officer would not have mustered him if he had come around the day after the accident occurred.

So far as the rate is concerned, there is only one question of doubt in my mind. From inquiry of the clerks who are detailed from the Pension Office, it appeared that his disability was one-half. Assuming that a full disability would entitle him to draw $12 a month, the committee reported in favor of an amendment changing the amount from $12 to $6. I am not sure but that there should be an amendment making it $10 a month instead of $6.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. I see in your report the statement—

The ground of rejection, as given to claimant, was no pensionable disability.

Is that the fact or is it not?

Mr. WOOD. It is a fact.

Mr. LOUD. Then I should like to ask you another question.

Mr. WOOD. I should like to explain that statement, because the bare statement would give an unfair impression. The pension office rejected it on the ground of no pensionable disability. The soldier appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, who decided that he was not pensionable because he never had been in the service of the United States, and directed the Commissioner of Pensions to inform the claimant of the true grounds of his rejection. It was done, but meantime he had filed a mass of testimony, of which the committee had the advantage, which clearly proved that he was disabled, I thought at the time, to an extent which would allow him $6 a month. I am inclined to think now it would entitled him to $10 a month.

Mr. LOUD. Still the evidence on file here seems to show that he was not disabled in a pensionable degree. Now, I should like to suggest to the gentleman that his wildest possible estimate here will not have given this soldier ninety days of service to bring him within the limits of the law.

Mr. WOOD. One word in regard to that. The rejection on the ground that the soldier was not disabled to a pensionable degree was a mistake of the Pension Office.

Mr. LOUD. Why should you have it in your report, then?

Mr. WOOD. Because the report states the exact facts.

Mr. LOUD. That is what I thought, and I brought it to your attention because I supposed that this must state the facts.

Mr. WOOD. It states the grounds upon which it was rejected. The Secretary of the Interior directed that the claimant be notified of the true grounds of rejection.

I have stated that the Pension Office rejected the claim because he was not in the military service of the United States. It first rejected the claim on the ground that he was not disabled in a pensionable degree; but after appeal it rejected the claim on the ground that he was not in the service of the United States.

Mr. LOUD. Still they never set aside the other finding, that he was not disabled to a pensionable degree.

Mr. WOOD. They conceded that it was a mistake, and the Secretary of the Interior decided that they had not given him the true ground. Upon appeal it was decided that the ground of rejection as given claimant by the Pension Department was wrong, and the Secretary of the Interior directed that the true reason should be given.

Mr. LOUD. Then your report does not correctly state your case.

Mr. WOOD. The report does not state every detail of the evidence. If it did, it would take three or four pages.

Mr. LOUD. I think you ought to state the material facts.

Mr. WOOD. It does show the fact that he appealed to the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. LOUD. I think you should state the material facts. You have stated here that the Pension Office did decide that he was not disabled in a pensionable degree, and then you go on to state that he filed a mass of evidence which might have proved some condition, but it never did.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will carefully read the report——

Mr. LOUD. I have read it as carefully as I could, and I can not find anything in your case, on your own statement.

Mr. WOOD. His case was finally rejected because he was not in the military service of the United States. That is the present ground of rejection, but the ground of rejection as given to the complainant was no pensionable disability.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well, that was the official record of the office, undoubtedly, given to him.

Mr. WOOD. He was rejected on appeal on another ground——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly; he has yielded to me.

Mr. WOOD. That is the Department's ground of objection. It appears they gave an incorrect ground; and that is not an altogether uncommon thing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the word "six" and inserting the word "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to amend the amendment proposed by the committee by striking out the word "six" and inserting the word "ten."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois tell me whether this applicant admits that he was mustered in the service or not?

Mr. WOOD. He claims that he was in the service, and he insists that he was mustered. The records, however, do not so show.

Mr. ERDMAN. Is there any reason given for the delay of some thirty-odd years?

Mr. WOOD. None, except that he has for years had a claim before the Pension Office.

Mr. ERDMAN. For how many years?

Mr. WOOD. I do not know how many years.

Mr. ERDMAN. Your report does not show that?

Mr. WOOD. No; it does not.

Mr. PICKLER. And never does.

Mr. WOOD. I think this claim was probably before one or more Congresses heretofore.

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman answer one other question?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. ERDMAN. You say in your report:

He then went home to Columbus, Ind., and claims was never able to return; that his officers informed him that his staying at home till he was fit for service would be all right.

Do not these facts show that this man was a deserter, and ought not his record to be corrected by referring it to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WOOD. He never having been mustered during the war, and the War Department never having regarded him as being in the service of the United States, he could not be a deserter from the service into which he had never been mustered.

Mr. ERDMAN. But you stated a while ago that he claimed to have entered the service.

Mr. WOOD. He claims to have been mustered, but neither the records in the War Department nor in the adjutant-general's office of Indiana show that. They show that he was enrolled, but there is no entry of his muster.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH A. COOPER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Joseph A. Cooper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph A. Cooper, late a brevet major-general in the United States Army, at the rate of $100 per month in lieu of the pension which he now receives.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Joseph A. Cooper, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $100 per month, beg leave to submit the following:

Gen. Joseph A. Cooper enlisted at Knoxville, Tenn., in September, 1847, as a private in Company D, Fourth Tennessee Infantry, and served with honor and credit in the Mexican war, reaching Vera Cruz in November, 1847, and the City of Mexico in January, 1848, and was honorably discharged at Memphis, Tenn., in July, 1848.

In the war of the rebellion he enlisted August 1, 1861, and was mustered in as captain Company A, First Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, August 8, 1861. He was promoted to be colonel of the Sixth Tennessee Infantry Volunteers on March 22, 1862; commissioned as brigadier-general on June 30, 1864; and was appointed brevet major-general of volunteers May 18, 1865, for gallant and meritorious conduct at Nashville, Tenn., and was honorably mustered out and discharged January 15, 1866.

During his entire service he was absent on leave fifty days, and reported able for duty every day save one.

General Cooper was 72 years old November 25, 1895, and a few years since, in his advanced years, applied for and was granted a pension as a Mexican survivor at $8 per month, certificate No. 5063.

On October 19, 1890, he applied for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, and was granted a pension (certificate No. 848653) at $12 per month. He never filed a claim under the general law of 1862.

The board of examining surgeons which examined him December 14, 1892, say: "He is a complete wreck physically and failing very fast." They find an injury to forehead compressing the brain and resulting in loss of memory and confusion of ideas; left clavicle disarticulated from sternum; left ankle weak and painful; has a bad stomach; severe indigestion, stomach and bowels bloat; liver seems to be under size, but sensitive on pressure. They rate him twelve-eighteenths for injury to head, eight-eighteenths for injury to left shoulder, eight-eighteenths for injury to left ankle, and eight-eighteenths for disease of stomach.

General Cooper is in needy financial circumstances, and owing to his age and physical condition, and taking into consideration his brilliant and magnificent military record, whereby he arose from sheer merit from the command of a company to that of an army corps, your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and the bill is ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I addressed the Chair several times.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. ERDMAN. I spoke as loud as I could.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

MOLLIE CRANDALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 507) to pension Mollie Crandall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mollie Crandall, widow of Clark P. Crandall, deceased, and late captain of Company C, First Regiment Oregon Volunteer Infantry, and pay her at the rate of $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. PICKLER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 507) to increase the pension of Mollie Crandall, have carefully considered the same and, adopting the accompanying Senate report as their own, respectfully report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

[Senate Report No. 68, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 507) granting a pension to Mollie Crandall, have examined the same and report:

The claimant is the widow of Clark P. Crandall, who was a captain in the First Oregon Infantry Volunteers. The soldier was mustered into the service December 27, 1864, to serve three years, and was mustered out of service with his company as captain October 31, 1865.

At the time of the soldier's death he was drawing a pension of $12 per month under the act of June 27, 1890, on account of rheumatism and disease of the heart, and nasopharyngeal catarrh. He never applied for pension under the general laws, although he would have been entitled to a large pension, as his hearing was very much affected by his army service, and his general health was very poor continually after his discharge. Senator J. H. MITCHELL, of Oregon, made an oral statement to the committee that he had known the soldier continuously from a few years before his enlistment until his death, and that he knows of personal knowledge that the soldier was a hale and hearty man before his army service, and that his health was very bad after his discharge until his death.

The widow now draws a pension of $8 per month under the act of June 27, 1890. The application for increase by special act is based on the fact that under the general law she would be entitled to $20 per month, the soldier having served as a captain.

The soldier died August 29, 1893, at Atlantic City, N. J., where he had been taken with the hope that he would find relief, and the following letters from well-known physicians of that city and of this city are submitted to show that soldier's death was due to the disease for which he received a pension, and which was doubtless due to service:

"ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., March 11, 1894.

"Mrs. M. CRANDALL, Washington, D. C.:

"In reply to your request as to the mode and cause of Captain Crandall's death, I would say that the Captain was suffering from 'carcinoma of the stomach,' of a variety that usually destroys life in about three years. The immediate cause of the patient's death, however, was directly traceable to a weak and more or less damaged heart, that could not be made to perform its proper work in spite of the liberal and continued use of such drugs as digitalis, strophanthu, nitroglycerin, and other strong heart tonics. Owing to the condition of the heart, Captain Crandall's death occurred at least two years earlier than would have been the case had that organ been in good condition.

"Very truly, yours, B. C. PENNINGTON, M. D."

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 5, 1894.

"I certify that I attended Capt. C. P. Crandall, of Company C, First Regiment Oregon Volunteer Infantry, as his family physician a number of times during the past few years, and always for the same chronic trouble, viz, rheumatism of the heart and bowel trouble.

"JOS. TABOR JOHNSON, M. D."

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 7, 1894.

"This is to certify that I attended Capt. C. P. Crandall, of Company C, First Regiment Oregon Volunteer Infantry, from time to time during the past ten years, and particularly in June, 1893, for cardiac disease resulting from rheumatism.

"SAM'L S. BOND, M. D."

"WASHINGTON, D. C., March 8, 1894.

"DEAR SIR: A few days ago Mrs. C. P. Crandall mentioned to me that she was trying for a pension. I would therefore state that I was intimate with the Captain for ten years or more, seeing him almost daily, and had several talks with him regarding his deafness, and I often advised him to make his application for pension on his disability, but always without avail. He often told me how it resulted, and that he had been examined by specialists, and had received treatment at one time for it.

"Now, Senator, if my knowledge of his condition will be of any service to her, and an affidavit of same will be necessary, I will gladly make one.

"Very respectfully,

"C. V. PETTEYS, M. D.

"Hon. GEO. L. SHOUP,
"United States Senate."

Dr. A. J. Hunton, of this city, John P. Church, and R. S. Lacey, each of whom had known the soldier for many years previous to his death, make written statements which are submitted as part of this report, in which it is asserted that the soldier had often related to them his experience in the service relating to the incurrence of the injuries alleged, particularly his deafness, caused, as they believe, by cannonading.

The statements above referred to are as follows:

"To whom it may concern:

"This certifies that I was intimately acquainted with the late Capt. C. P. Crandall for a period of seventeen years immediately preceding his death, which took place at Atlantic City, N. J., in August, 1893; that frequently during the period mentioned I heard him complain of suffering from attacks of rheumatism, and that these attacks were of so serious a character as to incapacitate him for the discharge of his duties in the Department in which he was employed at somewhat frequent intervals; that while I never made an examination of his case as a physician, I am decidedly of the opinion that throughout the entire period above mentioned Captain Crandall was to some extent suffering from what is known in medical parlance as rheumatic diathesis; that Captain Crandall, to my certain knowledge, during this period was to quite an extent deaf, and that I heard him state particularly the time and circumstances under which his hearing was impaired, such impairment being the result of the discharge of cannon while he was in the line of duty in the United States Army during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion.

"A. J. HUNTON,
"Late Captain, Twelfth New Hampshire Volunteers."

"I knew Captain Crandall during the last eleven years of his life. My acquaintance early became and remained intimate to the end. I am confident that the statement of Dr. Hunton is exact. I often heard Captain Crandall speak of the permanent injury to his health that resulted, in his opinion, from his military service. This is particularly true in regard to his deafness. I served three years in a battery, and Captain Crandall and I have often compared our experiences in action, and particularly the effect of cannonading on the sense of hearing. Captain Crandall repeatedly asserted, and I have never doubted, that his hearing was permanently and seriously impaired by such cannonading.

"JNO. P. CHURCH,
"Late Second Lieutenant, First Michigan Artillery."

"I got acquainted with Captain Crandall about seventeen years ago, and was always since on most intimate terms with him. His deafness was marked, and was a subject of frequent discussion between us. It seriously interfered with his duties as commander of our post during his service as such in 1884. I was the quartermaster, and had, necessarily, most intimate relations with him during that year. Though a lawyer by profession, yet I was educated as a physician, and thereby have been often led to investigate critically physical impairment of friends. I regarded Captain Crandall's deafness as chronic and of a serious nature. He attributed his deafness to his army service.

"R. S. LACEY,
"Late Captain of Volunteers, Quartermaster Burnside Post, G. A. R.,
"Department of the Potomac."

Your committee believe that the claimant is entitled to the amount named in the bill, namely, $20 per month, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, this report shows that this soldier was mustered into the service December 27, 1864, to serve three years, and was mustered out of service with his company as captain October 31, 1865; only about four months of service before the war ended. He was in receipt of a pension of $12 per month when he died. It is stated that had he made application under the general laws he would have been in receipt of a much larger pension in consequence of an additional disability, namely, the loss of hearing due to his army service, caused from the firing of cannon.

Now, I would like to know, and have the gentleman in charge of this bill give us some information upon the service of the soldier during these three or four months. I would like for him to state some of the battles in which this soldier was engaged. I would like him to state whether or not this soldier went outside of Oregon. I would like him to state where it was, and on what occasion this soldier lost his hearing by the explosion or shooting of a cannon. He was in an infantry company, and such companies used no cannon. Was there any engagement in the State of Oregon, possibly, with anybody except Indians? Is it customary to fight Indians much with cannon? I only want to gain this information from the gentleman in charge of this bill to know where this gentleman performed all this service, and where he lost his hearing on account of the discharge of cannon. I want this information. I do not pretend to say it is not true. But I want some light upon the subject, and if these things are facts I am willing to vote to pension this soldier; if they are not true I shall vote against the bill.

The application for an increase of pension is based upon the fact that under the general law she would have been entitled to $20 per month as the widow of a captain. What battle was he in and where did the fire of a cannon affect his hearing? Did he at any time serve outside of the State of Oregon; and if so, when and where? Let us know about it. Give us some facts. There is nothing here to show this committee that he performed any such service or that he ever heard during his four months of service the firing of a cannon. If he did this report does not show it. I am only asking for information. Is there any testimony before the committee that shows it? Did they have any evidence before them to prove these alleged facts? If so, I wish some gentleman would state it.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that I am heard this time. The committee do not know how much they missed by my being cut off when I attempted to get the floor a while ago. If they had heard my speech and the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina on the bill we have just passed they would have been amply repaid for the time spent in listening. I am sorry that I was not able to be heard upon that measure, inasmuch as it was the first of a line of bills that I hope the House will pass hereafter without any objection or quibbling. I am glad that it passed as rapidly as it did. [Laughter.] It was a bill pensioning a brigadier-general at $100 a month, and it passed without any question, without any objection, without even a vote being taken.

Now, as to the bill under consideration, this lady never applied at the Pension Office for an increase of pension. She never applied to the Bureau for a pension under the general law. She gets $8 a month under the act of 1890. Her husband, as I understand it, was a Senate employee up to the time of his death, drawing a large salary as such. There is not a scrap of evidence before the committee to sustain this claim, and nothing but petitions and certificates are set forth in this report; yet, instead of requiring this lady, as other widows are required, to establish by competent proof in the Pension Office her claim to a pension, you are asked to give it to her upon these mere representations and certificates. Are you willing to do it?

Several MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. ERDMAN. You are! Then you are willing to do anything. If without a scrap of evidence and in the face of all that appears in this report you are willing to pension this woman, you would be willing to pension the old slaves.

Mr. TALBERT. Is there any testimony that the man ever had a widow? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIS rose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman from Oregon will call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] to the mistake he has made with regard to the service of this soldier. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina to say that he had served only three or four months.

Mr. TALBERT. That was my understanding from reading the report.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The report says that he was mustered in in December, 1864, to serve three years, and was mustered out October 31, 1865.

Mr. TALBERT. But the war had ended before that time, and he only served four months.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no.

Mr. TALBERT. He was in actual service but three or four months, and I ask, for information, whether he had ever during that time been in a battle in which any cannon had been fired. I am only asking for information. I do not say that he did not hear a cannon. I make no charge of that kind, but I am seeking information, and I shall be glad if the representative of Mr. McKinley can give it to me. [Laughter, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ELLIS. Gentlemen are crying "Vote!" "Vote!" and perhaps they do not want to hear me.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oregon is probably the only member here that can explain this case. I know, of course, gentlemen, that you will pass this bill, but I want to say that I know something about Captain Crandall myself. I knew him for thirty years, and I do not believe he ever heard a cannon fired in his life unless by way of salute in some celebration. [Laughter.] I do not believe there is a man on the floor of this House who can for a moment assume that the First Oregon Infantry ever was engaged in a battle.

Mr. TALBERT. Did he ever have a widow? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Yes; he had a wife when I knew him in Oregon many years ago.

Mr. TALBERT. But did she not get a divorce when he came to Washington?

Mr. LOUD. That I do not know; but there are facts enough in this case without going into that. Mr. Chairman, the person who wrote this report could have double-discounted Robinson Crusoe. [Laughter.] Just read it and see how well it sounds! Here is one statement, signed by John T. Church—I do not know who he is:

> I often heard Captain Crandall speak of the permanent injury to his health that resulted, in his opinion, from his military service.

Now, permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that from what I know of Captain Crandall's service I do not believe he ever slept a night on the bare ground when he was in the Army or ever heard a cannon explode during his whole military service. [Laughter.] Mr. Church goes on to say:

> This is particularly true in regard to his deafness. I served three years in a battery, and Captain Crandall and I have often compared our experiences in action, and particularly the effect of cannonading on the sense of hearing.

How well it does sound! [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, I have here—and I am surprised that the soldiers of this country have not presented something of this kind before—a petition from one Grand Army post. And permit me to say, with all candor, that it is a wonder the honest soldiers of this country have not risen up almost in rebellion against the action of Congress in these pension cases in days gone by. [Applause.]

Now, let us hear what these soldiers say; and I believe this paper represents the sentiment of the honest soldiers throughout this country:

> Whereas the pension claims of tens of thousands of the soldiers and sailors of the late civil war remain undecided, while thousands of the claimants are yearly going to their graves; and
> Whereas we believe that the granting of special pensions at high rates to the widows of deceased officers of the Army and Navy is an unwarranted and unnecessary continuation of the discrimination of rank in favor of a class who were neither soldiers nor sailors, but only claim through inheritance: Therefore
> Be it resolved by Sedgwick Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of California—

And permit me to say that I at one time belonged to a post named after that prince of soldiers, General Sedgwick—

> That we oppose and condemn the granting of special pensions at high rates to the widows of deceased officers of the Army and Navy as an unjust discrimination against ex-soldiers and ex-sailors and their widows, who are limited to pensions of $8 or $12 per month, if any, and we demand that the widows of officers shall be pensioned under existing general laws.

Mr. ELLIS rose.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Oregon will excuse me; I am not quite through. I am sorry the gentleman did not precede me with his remarks, though perhaps I know as much about this case as he does, for I lived in Oregon myself away back in the sixties, shortly after the war, and am somewhat familiar with the extraordinary service rendered by troops upon the Pacific Coast.

Now, if this widow is getting $8 a month let me say in all seriousness that it is all she is entitled to. Captain Crandall never died as the result of his military service. Let us be honest; let us be frank. Many of you gentlemen around me knew Captain Crandall. He was at the other end of the Capitol a great number of years, and many of the older members of the House were personally acquainted with him. If you want to grant a gratuity to this widow do so, but do not, in the name of justice, act as though this man died as the result of service during the late war.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be an idea prevalent on the part of some gentlemen here that no man has known anything about a military service except those who saw it upon the fields of the South. Sir, some very good soldiers rendered their service upon the Pacific Coast. General Grant soldiered upon that coast; so did Sheridan; and General Canby, after passing through the war of the rebellion, was killed on the Pacific Coast in war with the Indians. It does not follow that because a man may not have participated in an active battle upon a Southern battlefield he never saw or knew anything of war. Some very sanguinary conflicts have been fought out in the far West. Why, sir, a whole regiment, including the colonel or general commanding, was annihilated upon a Western field—not one man left to tell the story. Still, gentlemen try to create the impression here that because a man's service was not upon a Southern battlefield some reflection is necessarily cast upon his military record.

It was not my privilege to know Captain Crandall personally, but from what I knew of him by reputation he stood high. He was well connected in the State of Oregon; his standing there as a gentleman and as a soldier was first class. Senator MITCHELL, in making his statement in this case before the committee, said that he knew Captain Crandall up to the time he entered the service; that until that time he was a hale, hearty man, but from the time he came out of the Army until his death he did not see a well day; that he was in a certain sense a wreck, and after lingering along died.

Now, one of the witnesses here says he tried to prevail on Captain Crandall to make application for a pension——

Mr. PICKLER. One of the physicians so testifies.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; one of the physicians testifies that he urged Captain Crandall to apply for a pension, feeling assured that he could get one under the general law.

Mr. MEREDITH. How long did Captain Crandall "linger"?

Mr. LOUD. Thirty years.

Mr. ELLIS. He lingered many years. He has been dead, I think, about three years. He was a man with pride of spirit, and for a long time he refused, though solicited by his friends, to make application for a pension. It was only when he was unable by his own efforts to make a living that he consented to make this application. Then the evidence of his comrades was beyond his reach; so he came under the special law of 1890, and received a pittance of $12 a month.

This bill has been twice passed by the Senate, and this is the second time it has been favorably reported to this House by the Committee on Invalid Pensions. In the Fifty-third Congress it was favorably reported, as it has been in this. It has been passed by the Senate in the Fifty-third and the Fifty-fourth Congresses.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to do a gentleman who is now dead and in his grave any injustice. But in order to make it plainer as to his service, I want to state again that the reports show that he was mustered into the service on December 27, 1864, and mustered out in October, 1865. The war ended in three or four months after he was enlisted, and it is nowhere shown that the command in which he enlisted was ever engaged with the enemy in any conflict. There is no evidence showing that he ever had an engagement in which rifles or anything else was used, not to speak of cannon, and yet it is stated and alleged here that he became deaf from the noise of cannonading. That statement, I believe, is made by one of the officials—Dr. Hunter, I believe.

Now, if it is a fact that witnesses have come here and stated that this man became deaf from the noise of cannonading when he was never in a single engagement with the enemy, why, then, what will you think of further testimony from the same witnesses, when it appears that he was never in a single engagement at all? Is the testimony worth anything as far as its credibility is concerned? And I submit, sir, that in granting pensions the House ought to demand better evidence than is given here in the report accompanying this bill.

Mr. Chairman, they are taking a step in reference to this matter which I do not think is warranted. I do not believe we ought to go into this question and grant a pension on such testimony. We ought not to go headlong in the granting of pensions, unmeritorious and undeserving, as this one, without having some testimony to support our actions. Not a single affidavit is presented here, but simple statements of belief, and that belief seems to have been entirely wrong on the facts as they appear.

I submit that it is an injustice to the other soldiers, to those who did fight, and who deserve pensions, to give them to such soldiers and to the widows of such soldiers as this, who have the audacity to come here with false evidence and state things that do not exist.

In the outset I only asked for information with reference to the case, whether or not this man ever heard a cannon fired. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], I think, stated on certain information, or information that he had received, that he never heard a cannon fired. There is no evidence that he ever heard even a popgun shoot off. [Laughter.] And yet he is lauded to the skies as a true soldier, a brave soldier, a gallant man, who saved the Union. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, he knew nothing of the Union; he cared nothing about it. There are a number of valiant soldiers to-day, with shining buttons on their coats, who would not know the United States flag from the flag of China or the flag of Hawaii or some other place if they saw it. [Laughter.] And yet these people come here and ask to be pensioned. I submit that it is wrong, all wrong. We ought not to do it. I hope the House will take a stand now on this question.

I move that this claim be laid aside to be reported to the House with an unfavorable recommendation.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "twenty," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will not prevail.

Now, after all this discussion and the demonstration on the part of gentlemen in regard to this bill, let me say to you that it is simply following the precedents of years past. This man having a sense of personal pride about him, as the evidence clearly shows, refused through all these years, although he was an invalid, to apply for a pension. The Government was saved just that much money by his action. If he had applied for a pension the widow would have received the pension to which a captain's widow is entitled, namely, $20 a month, for the entire time. This is the pension due to the rank of her husband. He was a captain, and if entitled to anything at all he would be entitled to $20 a month from the Government. It is unfair to her, therefore, to make this discrimination.

While I agree with some things that have been said in this discussion in regard to high pensions for the widows of brigadier-generals, and I do not believe in putting them on a plane so far above the other soldiers of the country, yet I think that there is a natural and necessary discrimination to be made in the amounts to be paid for pensions. There is at the same time too much difference in the pension of the brigadier-general and the private. But this is simply the pension of a captain's widow, of $20 a month; a man who had too much pride to apply for a pension when it was possible to avoid the necessity of doing so; and to refuse to grant that pension at this time will be an act of gross injustice to the widow.

The gentleman from Iowa who offered this amendment certainly does not understand the situation. It is simply treating this woman as a lieutenant's or private's widow or a captain's widow has been treated in all other cases which have heretofore been passed.

Gentlemen have said that this man did not see service. Why, Senator MITCHELL said that he knew the man before he went into the Army; that he was in robust health; that he came out of the Army in poor health, and he has known him ever since; that he was an invalid from the time he left the Army; and the testimony on that point is convincing.

The gentleman from South Carolina has fears that he was not in the line of duty; but, as a matter of fact, if he was in the line of duty with his battery drilling, and if the deafness arose even during the ordinary drills of the battery, then he was in the line of duty and his widow would be entitled to a pension just as if he had been injured in a battle.

There is nothing unusual about the pension. It is not a precedent. There are plenty of precedents for it. It is simply a right to which this woman is entitled.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. You say that there are precedents for this. Now, if a bad precedent is established, are you willing to follow it? Are you willing to claim that two wrongs make a right?

Mr. PICKLER. No; I do not admit that there was a first wrong in this case. I do not know of any wrong in the matter. The only wrong is in withholding this pension.

Mr. TALBERT. This proposes to give a pension to the widow of a man who never heard even a popgun fired.

Mr. PICKLER. How does the gentleman know so much about it?

Mr. TALBERT. I have asked information from the whole committee, and nobody seems to know anything about it, so that I must assume that certain facts exist on the best evidence I can get.

Mr. PICKLER. And the evidence is clear that he suffered deafness from this cannonading in the Army, and there is no dispute about it. I do not care whether it was in battle or wherever it was. The gentleman talks about the war being over. The Supreme Court of the United States have decided that the war did not end until the 20th of August, 1866.

Mr. TALBERT. And that same court knocked out the income tax. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER (continuing). That shows that the gentleman is not any better up on the law and the reason for declaring the war over at that time than he is on the facts in this case. President Johnson declared that the insurrection ceased in the State of Texas and that the war was over at that time. The Supreme Court so decided, and there is no income tax about it.

Now, I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw this motion. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa, if this woman is entitled to a dollar she is entitled to what the rank of her husband would give her, and that is in accordance with every bill that we are passing in this committee.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. What are this woman's financial circumstances?

Mr. PICKLER. She is in poor, needy circumstances.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I see nothing of it stated in the report.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, it is stated in the report. At least it ought to be. That is her condition, anyway.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I think it ought to be stated in the report, but I have not been able to find it.

Mr. ELLIS. I will state that that is the fact. She is in very needy circumstances.

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. ERDMAN. I find in this report the statement that at the time of the soldier's death he was drawing a pension of $12 a month.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. ERDMAN. Did you not state a little while ago that he was too proud to apply for a pension?

Mr. PICKLER. Under the general law. Now, let my friend read the first part of the report, which declares, as the gentleman will see, that he never applied for a pension under the general law.

Mr. ERDMAN. But he did after the act of 1890.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; when he became destitute.

Mr. ERDMAN. And he could not prove any other claim?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know whether he could or not. In his latter years he did apply for that, but clearly——

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question? Did this man belong to an infantry, cavalry, or artillery company?

Mr. PICKLER. I hope we can have a vote, Mr. Chairman. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this bill be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve."

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF and Mr. ERDMAN demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 87.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. ERDMAN) there were—ayes 100, noes 15.

Accordingly the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY A. HALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Hall, widow of Charles J. Hall, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, and allow her a pension rated at $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall, widow of Charles J. Hall, late private Company A, Seventh Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, having examined the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, beg leave to adopt the report of the Senate committee (No. 11) as their own in this case, and earnestly recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 344.

[Senate Report No. 11, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall, have examined the same and report:

Mary A. Hall is the widow of Charles J. Hall, late private Company A, Seventh Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry.

According to the report of Col. F. C. Ainsworth, Chief of the Record and Pension Division of the War Department, Hall's military record is as follows:

"Enrolled September 5, 1861, and discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability January 29, 1863. During that period the rolls report him present except as follows:

"December 31, 1861, on extra duty as carpenter, under command of Lieutenant Tardy, first lieutenant engineers, United States Army, since December 20, 1861. February 28, 1862, present on extra duty as above reported. April 30, 1862, on extra duty in Engineer Department, under command of General Gilmore, from February 24, 1862, to April 4, 1862.

"June 30, 1862, absent; wounded in action on James Island, South Carolina, June 16, 1862; sent to hospital at Hilton Head June 28, 1862. August 31, 1862, similar report; December 31, 1862, present, sick.

"Company and regiment in action June 16, 1862, in battle of James Island, South Carolina.

"The medical records show him as follows:

"Wounded in scrotum and nates severely by grapeshot or piece of shell at the battle of James Island, South Carolina, June 16, 1862; discharged January 29, 1863, on account of wounds."

Charles J. Hall died on April 1, 1891, and his widow, Mary A. Hall, applied to the Pension Office for a widow's pension October 29, 1891, which application was rejected in September, 1894, on the ground that the soldier's death was not traceable to his wounds received in the service of the Government during the war.

The cause of his death is given in the certificate of death on file in the town clerk's office of Thomaston, Conn., as "pericarditis (rheumatic)."

The physician who attended him, Dr. Ralph S. Goodwin, of Thomaston, in an affidavit dated February 21, 1894, testifies as follows:

"I attended Charles J. Hall, husband of Mary A. Hall, during his last sickness. His sickness and death were due in all probability to a gunshot wound received while in service of the United States Government. This wound was in the groin and perineum and scrotum. It took away a testicle, destroyed the sphincter ani, and produced chronic cystitis. This cystitis seriously impaired the functions of the kidneys to such an extent, I believe, as to produce a rheumatic diathesis from impaired excretion. The rheumatism produced valvular disease of the heart. He died from heart failure and dropsy and exhaustion from hemorrhages from the wound in the rectum, which never thoroughly healed. I consider that his death can be traced directly to the disabilities, infirmities, and severe physical exhaustion occasioned by the aforesaid wound."

This affidavit alone would seem to be sufficient on which to grant the pension, at least as to death resulting from service.

In a subsequent affidavit, made September 5, 1894, Dr. Goodwin said:

"I first became acquainted with Charles J. Hall, of Company A, Seventh Regiment Connecticut Volunteers (whose widow, Mary A. Hall, is an applicant for a pension), in the spring of 1873, when I treated him for rheumatism. He came under my professional care again in September, 1890. He became unable to work September 9, 1890, and worked no more until his death. His symptoms were dyspnœa, dropsical legs, general weakness, and an occasional hemorrhage from the rectum, the seat of an old wound.

"He was sent to the Hartford Hospital October 1, 1890, and remained there most of the time until March 18, 1891, when he returned to his home, and I took charge of him until his death, April 1, 1891. I saw him nearly every day during the last twelve days of his life. The immediate cause of his death was heart disease. He had general anasarca, great dyspnœa, precordial distress, and œdema of the lungs. He expectorated frothy blood for several days just previous to his death. Nearly every day during the last ten days of his last sickness he passed a gill of blood and pus from the rectum, which came from the unhealed wounds received during service in the United States Army. This repeated loss of blood was, in my opinion, a factor in the causation of his death."

Appended to this affidavit is one from the judge of probate certifying that Dr. Goodwin is a reputable physician.

Charles J. Hall was receiving $18 per month pension at the time of his death, having been certified by the medical examining board to be suffering from total disability; they further certifying that his injuries were equivalent to the loss of a limb.

According to the record, proof was made of the marriage of the claimant to Charles J. Hall on September 7, 1853, and it is also shown that neither had remarried.

The reason given by the Pension Office for rejecting the widow's claim is that it is not shown that the soldier's death was traceable to his wounds received in service. The only explanation of this ruling would appear to be that the Pension Bureau based its action entirely on the immediate cause of death given in the certificate of death (secondary cause not given) and gave no weight whatever to the affidavits of the attending physician, who had known him for eighteen years, and who is certified to as a reputable man and physician.

In view of the facts shown above, and in view of the further fact that, in the opinion of your committee, Mary A. Hall would be entitled to a pension under present laws had a more liberal construction been given to them by the Pension Office, your committee earnestly recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, was it the same physician who gave pericarditis as the cause of death in the certificate of death on file in the clerk's office in Connecticut, who afterwards testified that the cause of death was something else?

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to answer that question. That evidence was not examined by me, but I presume that it was the same physician. Admitting that it was, I claim this is as meritorious a bill as has been presented to this Congress.

This man received one of the most terrible wounds that any soldier ever received and lived. He suffered intensely during his life, and received for many years a pension of $18 a month, his disability being considered almost equal to the loss of a limb. His widow, the present claimant, was married to him in 1853. She is an old woman now, and appeals to us to do the justice that I wonder the Pension Office did not do her years ago. They rejected her claim for pension simply because they would not accept the real cause of death to be the wound received in the service, and yet the attending physician, who had known him for eighteen years, testifies as follows:

I attended Charles J. Hall, husband of Mary A. Hall, during his last sickness. His sickness and death were due in all probability to a gunshot wound received while in service of the United States Government. This wound was in the groin and perineum and scrotum. It took away a testicle, destroyed the sphincter ani, and produced chronic cystitis. This cystitis seriously impaired the functions of the kidneys, to such an extent, I believe, as to produce a rheumatic diathesis from impaired excretion. The rheumatism produced valvular disease of the heart. He died from heart failure and dropsy and exhaustion from hemorrhages from the wound in the rectum, which never thoroughly healed. I consider that his death can be traced directly to the disabilities, infirmities, and severe physical exhaustion occasioned by the aforesaid wound.

Now, it seems that the Pension Office rejected this testimony because the certificate given of his death by the physician at the time of his death was not fully set forth in that report. The reason given by the Pension Office for rejecting the widow's claim is—— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I am ready for a vote now. It is a just bill, Mr. Chairman, and ought to pass.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some gentleman rise in his place and explain the reason for the discrepancies in these three bills. One is a bill allowing a pensioner $100 a month. The next bill is one allowing a widow $20 a month in a case where a soldier served three months and did not see any service. You follow that with a bill where the soldier has served three years, saw good service, and was wounded in the service, and you allow his widow $12 a month. If a soldier who served three months and saw no service is entitled to $20 a month does it not stand to reason and common sense that this widow is entitled to $20 a month? I will move an amendment to that effect, that the word "twelve" be stricken out and "twenty" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, the fact is, that this bill gives the widow the pension to which she is entitled under the general law.

Mr. KEM. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. POOLE (continuing). She ought to receive this pension from the date of the soldier's death.

Mr. KEM. Does the gentleman mean to say that this woman is not entitled to $20 a month?

Mr. POOLE. She would only be entitled to $12 a month under the general law.

Mr. KEM. I do not care anything about the law [laughter] except the law of common justice. That is all I care anything about.

Mr. POOLE. What is your amendment?

Mr. KEM. My amendment is to strike out "$12" and insert "$20."

Mr. MEREDITH. I move to make it a hundred.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, this bill has passed the Senate at $12 a month. I do not wish to prevent her from getting a pension. We consider that she is entitled to $12 a month, and let this bill go through.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska to strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who do not pay much attention to these pension bills might think there was some point in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Nebraska. Now, we are asking the House to do exactly what the general law does. The widow of a captain, whose case was considered a few moments ago, did not prove up under the general law at the Pension Office. If she had she would have gotten $20 a month. If this widow could prove up there she would get $12 a month. We are simply following the pension law. [Applause.]

Mr. KEM. This House is granting special pension bills to cover such cases, and if they can be granted these pensions under the pension law, why are you coming in here and granting them?

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman is the only one I ever knew of who wanted to go further than the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to say anything against the passage of this bill. I have no doubt that the claimant should have a pension of $12 a month; but I am bothered about the principle of the thing. This is nothing but an appeal from the Pension Office. That is all it is.

Mr. POOLE. I admit that.

Mr. PICKLER. That is right.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I have written scores and scores of times to such people in my district, telling them that this House was not an appellate court to correct the errors of the Pension Office. I say to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, "Bring in a bill to make a law that will cover such cases, and do not pick out a few cases and reward them and allow others to go."

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. Then what kind of cases can be brought before this House? Would there be any claims to be acted upon here by special bills?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Let it be understood that all shall be served alike.

Mr. KEM. Amen. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRODE of Nebraska. Another question. If a pension can be allowed by the Bureau, then is the gentleman in favor of the House granting pensions at all?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. If it can not be allowed, change the Pension Office.

Mr. HILL. We will do that next year.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. If you can not change the office change the law. Again, Mr. Chairman, why has not this lady applied under the general law of 1890?

Mr. POOLE. Because in that case she would only get $8 a month, and she is entitled to $12 a month.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I see nothing said in this report of her circumstances.

Mr. POOLE. It is not necessary.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. It is not? Well, the time has come when it ought to be necessary in order to have a pension bill pass this House to show the facts which entitle the claimant to a pension. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Not just yet. I want gentlemen to think a little about this matter before they vote. There will be a hundred thousand cases like this before the Pensions Committee and before the House if this is to be made a precedent. I earnestly object to it. Let us take care of all these people, not merely of those who may be so fortunate as to have a friend in a member of this House or a member of the Senate. If there is merit in these cases, there are thousands and tens of thousands and scores of thousands of them. Now, I believe that this lady ought to have a pension.

A MEMBER. Then let us give it to her.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Oh, no; I am not here to vote for a special bill in every case where I would be glad to give a pension. Not by any means. Let us act upon some principle. Let the Committee on Invalid Pensions adopt some principle by which we can be governed and embody it in a general bill. I am opposed to distributing these little favors to one out of twenty thousand, when the whole twenty thousand ought to have them. If this lady is in indigent circumstances, she has only to apply to the Pension Office, under the law of 1890, and she will get $8 a month, and it is better that the case should be dealt with in that way than that an incorrect principle should be adopted here. Now, I ask the Committee on Invalid Pensions to cease reporting cases that can not be sustained upon sound principles, and which make bad precedents, and to bring into this House an amendment to the law that will cover all these cases.

Mr. TALBERT. Has not the gentleman discovered that this is a very peculiar case? It seems to me that a careful reading of the report in this case will do away with any doubt in regard to it. It seems to me that this woman ought to have a pension, and let us give it to her. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Well, Mr. Chairman, if I have made one convert I am satisfied. [Laughter, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in my liberality in granting pensions to the soldiers, their widows, and their orphans, and while the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] who has just taken his seat has stated a proposition which it seems to me everyone here ought to consider, there seems to be a disposition to press this bill at this time without due consideration. This House is not a court of appeals from the Pension Office, but it is a court for the relief of those who, under the general law, can not make a case when the equities entitle them to a pension. The pension bill that has just been passed, giving to a widow $20 a month, if I understood the report correctly, was justified in that way. If that widow could have proven her case in the Pension Bureau and shown that the disabilty from which her husband died was of service origin, then she would have been entitled to $20 a month under the general law.

I inferred from the report in that case that we are asked to cure that defect as a court of equity, to presume from the circumstances and facts that the disability was of service origin, and to give her the benefit of that presumption, and in that belief I voted for the bill. I am opposed to the legislation that has been attempted here in many instances. I sat here a week ago last Friday evening and heard a bill reported increasing the pension of a widow of a lieutenant from $30 to $50 a month for no other reason under the sun than that the widow needed money.

Now, there are 10,000 widows in Kansas that need money worse than she did. That kind of legislation is not equitable. This should be a court of equity, assisting those who can not recover under the law by reason of some technical defect or shortcoming, and when you legislate favorably in such cases you do justice to a deserving class. But when you pass a bill here, as was said by the gentleman from Iowa, in a case which could be allowed under the general law by the Pension Office, you do an injustice to thousands of meritorious claimants all over this land. I shall vote for this bill under consideration, because it seems to come within the equities.

I tell you that the soldiers of this country will understand it. We come here to these pension meetings, and the most that we can hope for is to pass through during a Congressional session two or three bills each for the members of this House and the members of the Senate, five or six hundred bills in all, for the relief of the soldiers of this Union. And instead of distributing those five or six hundred bills equitably among those who should be assisted, we are forgetting the equity that should be considered in these cases.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no; we are not doing any such thing.

Mr. BLUE. I hope the gentleman will have the politeness——

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I hope the gentleman will not misrepresent the committee.

Mr. BLUE. I have no disposition to misrepresent the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. You are doing it, anyhow.

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman will treat me politely, I will yield to him.

Mr. PICKLER. No, I do not want you to do that.

Mr. BLUE. This may be South Dakota courtesy, and it may be along the line of the dignified position of the chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. BLUE. I sought in a feeble way to serve this country for three years, and I yield to no man in my devotion to the flag and to the interest of this nation and to the welfare of the soldier, his widow, and his orphans. But let us be equitable here.

I do not intend to go into a wholesale condemnation of this committee. So far as I am able to see, up to this moment tonight there has been no inequity in the bills recommended. I did not hear the report fully relating to the bill introduced and supported by my colleague from New York. If it is true that there are exceptional circumstances in this case appealing to considerations of equity, then this widow should have the relief which the bill seeks to give her. If there are no such exceptional circumstances and if she can procure her pension under the general law, then the passage of this bill is an inequity with respect to thousands of just claims pending in the Pension Office and in the committee of this House—cases which appeal strongly to considerations of equity.

It is for this reason I have said what I have. I mean no discourtesy to the committee. I have not intended any discourtesy to the chairman of the committee. I wish to support the committee, but I wish to do it along the line of logic, of common sense, of equity, of fairness. The gentleman from Iowa is right in raising this objection and appealing to the House to consider this matter. Let the country understand that we are striving to do our duty here, and that we want to do it in an equitable and just way, so that the country will respect us when it is done. [Applause.]

Mr. PICKLER. I have given due attention to what the gentleman from Kansas has said. If I was a little too enthusiastic, I beg his pardon.

Mr. BLUE. It is granted.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, the trouble about the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] is that they do not take in the situation in this case.

Mr. TALBERT. They have not read the report.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes; that is it exactly. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Invalid Pensions may make mistakes; we do not claim that we are exempt from mistakes. But I want to say that in this case we have made no mistake. What does this report show? Here is a widow who, beyond all peradventure, taking into consideration the medical evidence in the case, ought to have $12 a month under the action of the Pension Office; yet, notwithstanding the overwhelming proof—I see that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is loading up the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] again. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PICKLER. I have the floor.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. PICKLER. I will, by and by; but I want to finish my statement.

As I was saying, according to the medical evidence in this case this woman ought to receive a pension of $12 a month by the action of the Pension Office. But, as the report shows, her application has been rejected there. Now, in a case of this kind this House is a court of appeals. Her case having been rejected at the Pension Office, she being unable to obtain anything over there, she has no resort but to this tribunal; and in her case nothing more is asked than what has always been done in similar cases.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] says, Why not bring in a general law to cover all these cases? Now, the gentleman is too good a lawyer to get up here and assert that if we should pass fifty general laws undertaking to cover all cases of this class there would not still be exceptional cases requiring action at our hands. It is just such cases that come before our committee and are reported by us to the House.

What would the gentleman from Kansas do with this widow? I leave it with him to say, upon a careful examination of this testimony, whether this widow is not entitled to receive $12 a month by the action of the Pension Office. Yet her case has been rejected there and she can not receive her pension. This is the only place where she can get relief. I would be glad if we could have, as the gentleman from Iowa suggests, a general law covering all these cases; but, as I have said, no general laws can be so broadly and perfectly framed as to obviate the necessity of our action in particular cases. It has been suggested—and the suggestion is a pretty good one—that there might be changes in the Pension Office; but that is a matter not within our province.

Gentlemen, this is one of the plainest cases that could be reported to this House. This woman is clearly entitled to a pension of $12 a month, as the gentleman from South Carolina has well said.

Mr. TALBERT. Then why not let us have a vote?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I want to inform the gentleman from South Dakota what it was I was "loading the gentleman from Kansas up" with.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, I do not care anything about that.

Mr. LOUD. Because I seem to be a kind of a red rag to the gentleman anyway, always exciting him.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no.

Mr. LOUD. But I am not afraid of the gentleman, as I think he has probably discovered by this time.

What I suggested to the gentleman from Kansas was that if he could swallow the case preceding this one he ought not to stumble at a case that had some merit in it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLUE. I wish to state to the gentleman from South Dakota that I do not antagonize this bill. I do not know whether it is meritorious or not. I was only trying to get to the relief of the gentleman from Iowa, in the general proposition advocated by him.

I am ready to vote upon the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. He has read the report and is now satisfied with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLUE. I do wish the committee could make a report that the gentleman who has just spoken could read, which would cure him of the disease that seems to affect him. [Renewed laughter.]

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM HENRY JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calender was the bill (H. R. 486) for the relief of William Henry Johnson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William Henry Johnson, who served under the name of Henry Johnson, of Company H, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry (Fifty-ninth Pennsylvania Infantry), transferred to Company H, First Pennsylvania Provisional Cavalry, and grant him an honorable discharge to date April 30, 1865.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 486) for the relief of William Henry Johnson, having had the same under consideration, recommend that the same do pass.

It is shown by the records of the War Department that Henry Johnson was enrolled and mustered into service October 29, 1861, at Philadelphia, Pa., as a private in Company H, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, to serve three years, and reenlisted as a veteran volunteer February 6, 1864. He appears to have served faithfully until April 30, 1865, when he deserted, never returning to his command. The Second Pennsylvania Cavalry was consolidated with the Twentieth Pennsylvania Cavalry June 17, 1865, to form the First Pennsylvania Provisional Cavalry, and the name of the soldier appears on the muster-out roll of Company H of the latter regiment with the remark: "Deserted April 30, 1865;" but his transfer to Company H, First Pennsylvania Cavalry, was not consummated, he never having joined that company, and it has therefore been canceled. He is regarded by the War Department as a deserter from Company H, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, from April 30, 1865.

Applying for removal of the charge of desertion and for an honorable discharge, William Henry Johnson, a resident of Ceresco, Saunders County, Nebr., stated in an affidavit dated February 6, 1896, that he served faithfully in Company H, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, until April 30, 1865, when he shipped on the monitor Montauk with the understanding that he had been transferred from the Army to the Navy, and that he served faithfully on that vessel eighteen months until discharged at Hog Island Navy-Yard, near San Francisco, Cal. In another affidavit, dated June 21, 1893, the applicant stated that he joined the Navy as a midshipman, and that he was discharged from the monitor Montauk in June, 1866.

It was ascertained by the Record and Pension Office, War Department, upon inquiry at the Navy Department, that no man named William H. (or Henry) Johnson served on the monitor Montauk, and that that vessel went out of commission July 7, 1865, at Washington, D. C. The application for relief was denied by the War Department October 24, 1893, holding that the case was not embraced within the provisions of the act of March 2, 1889, the soldier having deserted prior to May 1, 1865, and not having been prevented from completing his term of enlistment by physical disability incurred in the line of duty.

Your committee submit that under the act of March 2, 1889, if the soldier had not deserted until May 1, 1865, and after prior service of six months or more, and by reason of absence from his command at the time the same was mustered out he failed to be mustered out and to receive an honorable discharge, upon proof of such facts the charge of desertion would, under such act, be removed from his record. Waiving the benefits of the service in the Navy, as claimed by the soldier, and although the War Department may, under its strict construction, have determined that unless the soldier was borne on the company rolls as present or properly accounted for as of May 1, 1865, his application for removal of charge of desertion should be denied, yet your committee believe that a soldier serving until the 30th day of April, 1865, under a fair construction of the act of March 2, 1889, comes within its purview, and that therefore the relief applied for in this case should be granted.

It appears further from affidavits of those acquainted with him prior to and since his enlistment in 1861 that he was rather weak-minded and vacillating, and was wanting in that steady purpose of mind which would justify holding him strictly accountable for every act or deviation from correct conduct. Others testify that he is still afflicted with a form of dementia, and consequently hardly able to take care of himself; that he lives in what is called a dugout, and is about 65 years of age; that he is being helped by charity, and for the past three years has been assisted from the county funds.

Your committee has no doubt, from the proofs submitted in this case, that William Henry Johnson is the same Henry Johnson who served in Company H, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES E. JONES.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles E. Jones, late photographer for the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, said pension to be at the rate of $30 per month.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 909) granting a pension of $30 per month to Charles E. Jones, late photographer of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, for consideration in connection with Senate bill 249, which passed the Senate January 21, 1896, granting a pension of $30 per month to the said Charles E. Jones, having carefully examined and considered the facts and circumstances in evidence in this case, respectfully attach hereto the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions and adopt it as their report in this case, and adopt Senate bill 249 as a substitute for House bill 909, and earnestly recommend that the same do pass.

[Senate Report No. 21. Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to C. E. Jones, have examined the same, and report:

This bill passed the Senate during the Fifty-third Congress.

Claimant was not an enlisted man, and hence not pensionable under the general law. He was employed as a photographer, and in that capacity rendered valuable service to the Union cause. Not only did he faithfully perform his duties as a photographer, but the evidence clearly shows that he performed actual military service, and that while thus engaged he received a gunshot wound which has resulted in almost total blindness.

There seems to be no question as to the incurrence of the disability, the affidavit of Capt. R. B. Ward, herewith appended, being conclusive on that point. Many other affidavits are on file which tend to confirm Captain Ward's statement. Had claimant been an enlisted man there can be no reasonable doubt of his right to pension, and having performed actual military service, and being wounded while thus engaged, the duty of Congress to come to his relief is clear and imperative.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

AFFIDAVIT OF CAPT. R. B. WARD.

STATE OF MISSOURI, County of Jackson, ss:

In the matter of Charles E. Jones, claimant.

On this 5th day of September, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county, duly authorized to administer oaths, Robert B. Ward, age 61 years, a resident of Kansas City, in the county of Jackson and State of Missouri, whose post-office address is Kansas City, Mo., well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case, as follows:

"I have known above claimant, Charles E. Jones, since the spring of 1862, when he came to and joined the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry as photographer, I being captain of Company D of said regiment. Said claimant was not an enlisted man, but I know of him being in several engagements under military orders, and in April, 1863, I know of my personal knowledge that the said Charles E. Jones was ordered to take photographic view of Longstreet's fortifications at the siege of Suffolk, in the State of Virginia, and while performing his duty, acting under orders of Gen. John Peck, commanding officer, said claimant, Charles E. Jones, received gunshot wound from Longstreet's sharpshooters in the small of back, across the spine, which affected his eyesight and has caused blindness of both eyes to such an extent that said claimant has to be accompanied with a guide at all times to walk around, rendering him as good as totally blind.

"R. B. WARD."

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of September, 1890.
[SEAL.] ROBERT S. RODGERS, Notary Public.

AFFIDAVIT OF W. D. HOOVER, M. D.

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Miami, ss:

In the matter of appeal for pension through special act of Congress by Charles E. Jones, regimental photographer, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers.

On this 29th day of October, A. D. 1894, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the said county, duly authorized to administer oaths, W. D. Hoover, aged 60 years, a resident of Paola City, in the county of Miami and State of Kansas, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly affirmed, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

"That I have been acquainted with the said Charles E. Jones since 1867, when he first came to Paola, Kans., and that his eyes were diseased then, and that they continued to grow worse until he became totally blind, or nearly so. He can just barely grope his way with the use of his cane. He received a gunshot wound across the small of his back while in the line of duty in the Army during the late war. The ball passed across the back just over the second lumbar vertebra, and has left a scar over one-half an inch across and more than an inch in length. It is a wonder it did not cause paraplegia. His eyes became affected before he recovered from the wound in the back, and I am of the opinion, taking the prostrated condition of his system, especially the nervous system, into consideration, if the wound in the back was not a primary cause of the disease of the eye it certainly was a secondary cause. Said Jones has been a good citizen during his residence here.

"The above is from my personal observation of the case, and is written by myself."

His post-office address is Paola, Kans., and further declares that he has no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution.

W. D. HOOVER, M. D.

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Miami, ss:

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, including the words erased and the words added, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in the prosecution; and that said affiant is personally known to me, and that he is a credible person.

[L. S.] WARD J. CARPENTER,
Notary Public.

(My term expires March 27, 1895.)

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Certainly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. This man was the regimental photographer, I believe, was he not?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not know that he had that designation. It was his business.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I confess that I feel a deep sympathy for any photographer. I am a photographer myself, more or less successful, and always supposed that no photographer could have taken his kodak in hand and gone to the front unless he had taken a given part in the hostilities then pending. I have learned, however, recently that regimental photographers were noncombatants. I have learned that they belong to the same class of men as provost marshals, contract surgeons, and teamsters——

Mr. PICKLER. All of them pensionable.

Mr. McCLELLAN (continuing). That wicked class of teamsters which we heard so fully and clearly described two weeks ago, and since we have heard the noncombatant class described I have been obliged to amend my opinion of army photographers.

In that connection I send to the desk and ask to have read, as a part of my remarks, the eloquent words of a gentleman whose opinion upon the subject of the noncombatants in general, and the wicked teamsters in particular, I have the highest regard for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the gentleman has been born since the war. [Laughter.] No man who was in the Army and knows anything about soldiers and teamsters would make such a statement as the gentleman from Maryland has when he compares a teamster, hired by the month, who could quit when he pleased, and quit the Army, with a man who enlisted and who had to go into battle. The teamster did not have to go into battle if he did not want to, and he incurred no danger.

Mr. MILES. But this man did go into battle.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not yield. I refuse to yield. When the gentleman compares a teamster to a soldier and gets up here and prates about putting a man who never was enlisted on the pension roll on an equality with the enlisted soldier it shows that he was born since the war. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is entirely consistent. A teamster is doing well if he gets on the pension roll at all, and no teamster and no man who is not an enlisted man does get on the pension roll unless he was wounded in the Army. This man was shot. He got a little more of it than most of the teamsters got. He was shot, and was in the hospital, and the committee concluded that, as he was at the front and was wounded, even though he was a teamster and not an enlisted man, and therefore had been refused a pension by the Pension Office, he ought to be pensioned at the rate of $12 a month. It is a fair and liberal pension, and any nonenlisted man is doing extremely well to get such a pension; and therefore I beg that the gentleman from Maryland will not say that there is any inconsistency in pensioning at $30 a month a real soldier, an enlisted man who was wounded, and then get up and shed crocodile tears over the case of a teamster. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. I hope that no "crocodile tears" will be shed over this photographer. He got a little more than most of them, because he seems to have been wounded fighting gallantly, but he was not an enlisted man.

The bill, however, proposes to grant a pension of $30 a month, $18 more than the teamster we pensioned two weeks ago, who fought just as gallantly as the photographer. I grant you that he was a gallant man; but like the teamster of two weeks ago, however, he had the option of leaving "when he pleased."

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Has the gentleman noticed the portion of the report that shows that the wound which this photographer received has succeeded in blinding him completely? Does the gentleman refuse, or would he be unwilling, to pension a totally blind man?

Mr. McCLELLAN. The trouble is that it does not appear that the blindness came from the wound.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Ah, no; pardon me. I think not. It said his eyes became affected before he recovered from the wound in the back.

Mr. PICKLER. Look up at the top of page 2.

Mr. ERDMAN (reading):

And I am of the opinion, taking the prostrated condition of his system, especially the nervous system, into consideration, if the wound in the back was not a primary cause of the disease of the eye it certainly was a secondary cause.

Mr. PICKLER. Now let me read to the gentleman:

Said claimant, Charles E. Jones, received gunshot wound from Longstreet's sharpshooters, in the small of back, across the spine, which affected his eyesight and has caused blindness of both eyes to such an extent that said claimant has to be accompanied with a guide at all times to walk around, rendering him as good as totally blind.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Now, does the gentleman mean to say that a man who could leave at any time, a man who was getting good wages, should stand on the same level with a man who enlisted, who wore the uniform, who went to the front and fought and bled and died——

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir; and if this was the case of an enlisted man, he would get $72 a month. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. He would not get it. This is only a secondary cause. He would get $12 a month.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. Total blindness from disabilities contracted in the Army entitles a pensioner to $72 a month.

Mr. McCLELLAN. You have one affidavit from a man who says it may be that the blindness is a secondary result. But this is a case like that of the teamster, two weeks ago, a man who fought gallantly; and to be consistent we ought not to pension him for more than $12 a month. Two weeks ago, if the gentleman will remember, I offered an amendment to put that teamster on the pension roll as though he had been enlisted, and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] objected simply on the ground that he had not worn the uniform and had not been regularly enlisted.

Mr. PICKLER. That was not the sole reason.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. PICKLER. As I remember now, that teamster was not blind. He was in no such condition of disability as this man.

Mr. McCLELLAN. He was a total wreck.

Mr. PICKLER. Here is a man who, if he had been an enlisted man, would get $72 a month.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The teamster would have got $30 a month if he had been enlisted; and while I feel that I ought to move an amendment, to be consistent with that opinion of the great expert on noncombatants in general and teamsters in particular, my sympathies are so aroused in this case that I shall not move that amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, can any person advance any good reason why this noncombatant, this nonenlisted man, should be placed on a better footing than a soldier regularly enlisted? If you are going to pension this man, why not compel him to do what all soldiers are required to do—make lawful proof of his claim before a body competent to dispose of it and to judge of it? Instead of that, upon the affidavit of one physician, who says that this wound may be the secondary cause of his blindness, you are going to grant him $30 a month.

This affidavit says the shot in the back may have been the cause of the blindness. You want to render an affront to all soldiers who go to the Pension Office now and prove their claim by letting this go through in this slipshod manner. If you care to do it, proclaim it to the world, but do not seek to do it under cover. Be manly, and explain to the whole world that any person who can find a friend at court, an advocate here in this House, to demand a pension for him, shall have it without proof. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I can not find a report of this case here. I should like to know if there is anybody in the House who can vouch for the person who made the affidavit? Here we are confronted with a case where one person, apparently unknown to anybody in this House, off in the State of Missouri, makes an affidavit that a regimental photographer received a gunshot wound. Permit me to say that the position of regimental photographer is an office I never heard of. Where an army corps has been encamped for a time, I have known photographers to come around to take miserable pictures of some of the boys. Is it not, perhaps, pertinent to this case to know who it is that makes this affidavit? There is but one affidavit in this case that this man was shot. Is there anyone in this House that knows about this affidavit?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I will try to enlighten the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly; information is just what I want.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Does the gentleman understand, when the Committee on Invalid Pensions make their report, that they bring before the House all the testimony that was submitted to the committee and that the members of the House are supposed to read all of that testimony for themselves?

Does not the gentleman know that in these cases there are sometimes 50 and 75 affidavits, and that the committee, after examining the evidence and the circumstances, make their report as to the facts, and on the facts make their determination? And is it not true that in almost all of these cases members must take the judgment of the committee as to what the facts are in a given case and can not themselves investigate each and every case? There is one affidavit set out there and embodied in the report. Hardly ever, however, is an affidavit embodied in the report, because there are cases where there are a hundred affidavits and not one of them set out in the report; and therefore the gentleman need not assume because there is only one affidavit set out that that is all the testimony on which the committee base their report.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. GROUT. I desire to answer the gentleman's question. I have it here in the report.

Mr. LOUD. I have one very strong answer to the gentleman that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. GROUT. There are two affidavits given in the report, and the credibility of both witnesses is certified to by the notaries public, Robert S. Rodgers, in one instance, and Ward B. Carpenter in the other.

Mr. LOUD. What does that signify?

Mr. GROUT. This is the language:

On this 5th day of September A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county, duly authorized to administer oaths, Robert B. Ward, age 61, a resident of Kansas City, in the county of Jackson and State of Missouri, whose post-office is Kansas City, Mo., well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit——

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman knows that that is the regular form.

Mr. GROUT (continuing):

and who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

The gentleman wanted to know who certified to the credibility of the witness.

Mr. LOUD. That is the regular form.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly. I am seeking for information.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. This bill passed the Senate and the House last Congress and was thoroughly investigated at that time.

Mr. LOUD. It would not do any hurt to investigate it a little again.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. It was not signed because it passed too late to become a law. This gentleman is well known in Kansas. The party himself is well known to several of the members of the Kansas delegation and is an honorable, upright, and honest man and very deserving. To-day he has to be led around the streets at his home by a little boy or an attendant, and there is no question that his disabilities are the result of wounds that he received in that battle.

Mr. LOUD. Of course, Mr. Chairman, you can see that the answer to my question is so moving and convincing that there is no gentleman who will answer it. I asked the question if there is anybody in this House to-night who can vouch for the standing of the party who made the affidavit. The gentleman from Vermont gets up and reads the usual form as printed in every notary's affidavit; but he, as a lawyer, knows that that amounts to nothing—that the notary will acknowledge anybody's signature as far as an affidavit is concerned.

Let us take the conditions as they exist. Here is a proposition to pension a person who was a photographer, claiming to be a regimental photographer. Men who were in the Army know that any such person never existed; know that a photographer could not exist if his business was to come from a regiment, a brigade, or a division. And permit me to say that photographers did not follow the Army when they were engaged in active service. My experience was that photographers came to us in winter quarters or when we had camped for a time in one place. Now, I have asked the question three or four times. Three or four gentlemen have assumed to answer it. I say we are confronted with an affidavit of a gentleman, and no one here so far has been willing to say that he was in the Army with this man. I would like to have the facts known, and if anybody can give them I will quit.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield to the gentleman from Vermont because the gentleman failed to know anything.

Mr. LONG. I know something about the gentlemen who made these affidavits. I know them personally, or one of them. There are two of them. One is Dr. Hoover.

Mr. LOUD. He does not claim to have been in the service with him.

Mr. LONG. How is that?

Mr. LOUD. This doctor does not claim to have been in the service with him.

Mr. LONG. I refer to the affidavit on the second page of this report.

Mr. LOUD. Does this doctor claim to have been in the service and know that this man received the wound in the service? I ask you that. You have the report.

Mr. LONG. There is no question about that. The gentleman is aware that this bill passed the last Congress.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I do not care about that. We pass lots of bills that ought not to pass, and I have no doubt that we will pass a great many, Mr. Chairman, that never should receive the consideration of any gentleman if these pension cases were fully investigated. Now, I have been asking the question whether there was any gentleman on this floor who knows personally that this gentleman who makes this affidavit was in the service and occupied a position to know the facts stated. It is a material question to know who this man is.

Mr. GROUT and Mr. BLUE rose.

Mr. LOUD. Before I yield, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if the gentleman from Vermont has any more information to give?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. LOUD. I have not yielded the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman suspended his speech, and the gentleman from Kansas has been recognized.

Mr. LOUD. When I finish my remarks I will take my seat, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLUE. I have no disposition to press the yielding of the gentleman from California, but I expect the Chair will control.

Mr. LOUD. He will try to, you may be sure. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has been recognized.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I happen to know this man who is an applicant for a pension here. I have known him for over twenty years, and he is so reputable a man that in the community in which he resides he was the nominee of the Democratic party for the Kansas legislature a few years ago. It may have been a case of the blind leading the blind [laughter], but I hope it will be no disparagement of his claim to state the fact. I have known him in his industrious ways going out, led by some one, and so attentive to his business that he has managed to sustain himself. This bill, in substantially the same language, was passed by the last Congress.

Mr. LACEY. May I correct the gentleman?

Mr. BLUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. It was not in this language. There is a very distinct difference between this bill and the one passed in the last Congress. I will call the gentleman's attention to the difference if he desires.

Mr. BLUE. I am not aware of any difference, and I would be glad to be informed of it now if there is any.

Mr. LACEY. The difference is this: This man was shot in the back, and he claimed that that shot in the back affected his eyes by some nervous connection between the two. The committee could not find that the injury to the eyes was caused by the gunshot wound in the small of the back, but they thought that he should have such a pension as the disability caused by the gunshot wound would entitle him to, and they reported a bill putting him on the roll for the gunshot wound, leaving the rating to the Pension Office, as in the cases of other civil employees. With an amendment like that this bill would give him a pension for the gunshot wound. If the blindness was the result of the gunshot wound, then of course——

Mr. BLUE. That is a difference without a distinction. The fact is, that the bill passed for $30 a month in the last Congress, and that is all we ask now, and it failed of becoming a law only by reason of the inability of the President to reach it in time to sign it before Congress adjourned. It was supported at that time by Senator Martin of Kansas. The affidavit, as I read it—and I shall be glad to be corrected if I make a mistake—shows that this wound was received while the man was obeying an order from an officer. The objection which the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] makes to this affidavit might be made to every affidavit sustaining a pension claim in this House. I take it that the gentleman is too good a lawyer to raise a question as to the credibility of this witness without any proof directed at his credibility or his character for veracity, simply because the gentleman himself suspects that there might be something wrong about him.

Mr. LOUD. I do not suspicion. I asked if there was any person here who knew the party who made this affidavit, and I have got repeated answers that they do, but I have got no information about it.

Mr. BLUE. I have no knowledge from actual acquaintance, but I understand that the witness who makes the affidavit—and I think perhaps the affidavit on its face will show that fact—was a captain of a regiment in the service where this man was performing this duty under orders. If I am incorrect about that I shall be happy to be corrected.

Mr. LOUD. Nobody can correct you, because nobody seems to know anything about it.

Mr. BLUE. So, Mr. Chairman, as was stated by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, if this case arose under the general law, the man would be entitled to $72 a month. We ask for only $30 a month, and it seems to me that a wound received in the execution of an order ought to be regarded as equivalent to a muster into the service, and so far it has been so regarded in these cases.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "rate" and inserting "proportionate to his disability from gunshot wound in the back and results." That is precisely as the bill passed the House in the last Congress and as the Senate concurred in it. That would give him what he would have received if he had been a soldier of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry and had got shot. Now, I think there is no reason why a photographer should get more than a soldier.

Mr. GROUT. What would be the pension?

Mr. LACEY. That would depend upon the disability.

Mr. GROUT. As a result of the gunshot wound in the back.

Mr. LACEY. The pension would depend on the extent of the disability. It might be $8 or $12 a month. In other words, he would get just what a soldier would get for that wound, his claim being presented to the Pension Office under the general law.

The amendment offered by Mr. LACEY was read, as follows:

Line 8, after the word "rate," strike out the words, "of $30 per month, said Jones having become practically blind, the result of a gunshot wound received in the line of duty," and insert "proportionate to his disability from gunshot wound in the back and results."

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to vote for this bill. I hope it will pass. I rise to occupy about one minute for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] to this bill as illustrating the fallacy of the position which they assumed a while ago, that these cases could be cared for by general law. And I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the inconsistency of his position when he fought a little while ago the claim of a widow because, as he said, there ought to be strong equities presented, and now this man appears from Kansas——

Mr. BLUE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. BLUE. The gentleman is wholly mistaken when he says that I "fought" that claim. I had no such intention, and I said nothing against it. I simply spoke of the general policy, and everybody here so understood me.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, I regret to say that unfortunately I am one of those individuals who understood the gentleman the other way. I presume that was my fault and not his. But my experience in life has been that when a man slaps my face and says he does it in fun, I usually think he is mistaken. If, however, the remarks of the gentleman were not directed against that bill, then I take back everything I have said and congratulate him on the fact that he lives in Kansas, and that he is able to see the equities of a case when it comes from Kansas, even if he can not see the equities of a case when it comes from Connecticut. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am just as anxious to vote as are these gentlemen who call out "Vote!" "Vote!" But before I vote on this bill I should like to have some light thrown upon it. Here is an application for a pension for a man who never enlisted in the service of his country; there is no evidence in the report of the committee to show that he ever did one minute's service for the Union cause. Here is an application to grant a pension to a man who had gone out with his apparatus—whatever you may call it; kodak, a gentleman near me suggests; I call it apparatus so that gentlemen here may understand it; so that the gentleman from Kansas may understand it—he had gone out for the sole purpose of making money to put into his own private pocket, whether the Union was saved or lost. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that unless this man was in the service of his country, unless he had been employed by official authority to serve his country by using his photographic instrument to take pictures, he is not entitled to one moment's consideration at the hands of this House.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman know that the report speaks of this man as photographing, under the order of the Federal officer in command there, Longstreet's fortifications. Now, does the gentleman think there is no danger in that kind of service?

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, and I expect the gentleman himself got mighty tired of photographing those people sometimes. But, sir, I want to say there is no evidence to show that this man went there for any other purpose than observing the country. The army officers found him there with his instrument and pressed him into the service as a bummer or a camp follower, and possibly a stray bullet hit him while he was making tracks to the rear, for I understand he was shot in the back.

Mr. ERDMAN. And went blind from it!

Mr. TALBERT. Yes, and went blind from it, as another man grew deaf from the reports of a cannon that he never heard or saw. I submit, Mr. Chairman, there is just as much justice in this claim as there would be in that of a man who heard nothing but a popgun. He was there with his apparatus taking pictures for his own benefit—not for the benefit of the Union, but for the benefit of himself and himself alone. I must say that I am astonished to see the Committee on Invalid Pensions, presided over as it is by the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota, bringing in such claims as this with a favorable report and asking this House to pass them.

Mr. Chairman, while I feel it my duty to vote, as I have said, for every meritorious claim—I intend to do so and I have done so—I can not with a clear conscience support any such claim as this. And I dare say that if gentlemen on the other side would stop and reflect a moment they would vote this measure down by an overwhelming majority, showing to the country that while they are ready to do anything to stand by the "true-blue" soldiers and their widows, as they ought to do, they are men enough to turn their backs upon photographers, deserters, coffee coolers, bummers, and camp followers, such as this man was when engaged there taking pictures. I hope that gentlemen on the other side, when their good sense and their sense of justice is appealed to, will see to it that this measure is overwhelmingly defeated, as it ought to be.

Mr. JOY. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. JOY. Will not the gentleman be kind enough to let us vote on the bill? There is only one minute of the session left.

Mr. TALBERT. I would be perfectly willing to do so, but there are just one or two points which I had not reached and which I desire to discuss. [Laughter.] The first is the insufficient evidence——

The CHAIRMAN. The hour fixed by the rule for adjournment being at hand, the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN reported to the House, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Joseph A. Cooper; the bill (H. R. 486) for the relief of William Henry Johnson; the bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall, and the bill (S. 507) to pension Mollie Crandall; also, with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the bill (H. R. 2621) to increase the pension of Jane Webster, widow of Joel Webster; also, with an amendment and a recommendation that it be passed as amended, the bill (H. R. 1634) to grant a pension to William F. Good; also that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half past 10 having arrived, the House now, in pursuance of its previous order, stands adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of T. J. McClendon, administrator of John Wright, deceased, against The United States, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 23, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WOLCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was dispensed with.

ORDERS FOR THE SEIZURE OF VESSELS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, certain information as to what orders have been issued from the Treasury Department to seize vessels of the United States loaded with arms and munitions of war, with passengers on board, suspected to be destined for foreign ports, and under what authority of law such seizures and arrests have been made; which, with the accompanying document, was, on motion of Mr. CALL, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting the report of the delegates of the United States to the Fifth International Prison Congress, held at Paris, France, July, 1895; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 19th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolutions:

An act (S. 227) to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermasters' vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo.;

A joint resolution (S. R. 47) relating to the Federal census; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 10 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 20th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans; and

An act (S. 1804) to authorize the First National Bank of Sprague, Wash., to change its location and name.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the bill (S. 818) for the relief of Halvor K. Omlie, of Homer, N. Dak.

NATIONAL SANITARIUM FOR TREATMENT OF PULMONARY DISEASES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 11th day of April, 1892, I submitted some observations in support of a joint resolution that I then introduced for the appointment of a commission to examine certain lands in New Mexico and other of the Rocky Mountain States, with a provision that a report should be made to the President of the United States, with a view ultimately of having a cession of lands made for the purpose of establishing a national sanitarium for the treatment of pulmonary diseases. That scheme, as originally contemplated, has fallen through, but the parties who are interested in the establishment of a sanitarium for this purpose have sent me a large bundle of petitions looking to the direct cession of land to an organization of benevolent men and women interested in this matter, and after I have presented the petitions I desire to submit some brief observations in reference to this very laudable undertaking.

Mr. President, I present a petition of 24 citizens of the Territory of New Mexico; a petition of P. A. Dewey and 19 other citizens of New York; a petition of R. W. Lord and 13 other citizens of Maine; a petition of S. O. Brown and 11 other citizens of Maine; a petition of Eben Chase and 11 other citizens of Maine; a petition of J. H. Manly, Governor Henry B. Cleaves, and other citizens of Maine; a petition of Gorham P. Pomeroy and 19 other citizens of Rhode Island; a petition of Edward S. Aldrich and 19 other citizens of Rhode Island; a petition of Charles Clark Camp and 22 other citizens of Minnesota; a petition of Fred C. Ackley and 16 other citizens of Minneapolis, Minn.; a petition of Hon. William H. Eustis and 43 other citizens of Minneapolis, Minn.; a petition of A. B. Chalmers and 35 other citizens of Minnesota; a petition of John Wright and 20 other citizens of Minnesota; a petition of A. S. Grow and 8 other citizens of Pennsylvania; a petition of Charles E. Dodge, M. D., and 20 other citizens of New Hampshire; a petition of J. H. Emerson and 18 other citizens of New Hampshire; a petition of J. F. Estes and 47 other citizens of New Hampshire; a petition of W. W. Roberts and other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Alfred Hemenway and other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Julia Ward Howe, John D. Long, and other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of ex-Governor William Claflin and other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of William Coveney and other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Franklin Carter, president, and 11 other members of the faculty of Williams College, Massachusetts; a petition of George V. Ladd and 23 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Rollin Jones and 22 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Frank A. Allen and 41 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of John C. Haynes and 43 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of John A. Scott and 10 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of S. G. Miller and 37 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Charles D. Jenkins and 14 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Henry J. Thayer and 17 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of B. H. Nourse and 14 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Charles H. Taylor and 11 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Robert P. Bellows and other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of Dr. William P. Wesselhoeft and 19 other citizens of Massachusetts; a petition of the Superior and Sisterhood of the Home at the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Boston, Mass.; a petition of Rev. Edward Everett Hale and other officers of the American Invalid Aid Society; and a petition of the faculty of Yale University.

I ask unanimous consent that I may make some brief observations concerning the petitions just presented.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Among the petitioners will be found the names of Edward Everett Hale, Louis C. Southard, Minot J. Savage, Hezekiah Butterworth, E. H. Clement, Wallice I. Pierce, Solomon Schindler, Edwin Ginn, Julia Ward Howe, John D. Long, M. I. Whipple, bishop of Minnesota; William Lawrence, bishop of Massachusetts; William E. Russell, ex-governor of Massachusetts; William Claflin, ex-governor of Massachusetts; Edw. Harvey Willett, president Trinity Club; A. E. Winship, Charles H. Taylor, editor Globe; editors Boston Herald, Traveller, Advertiser, Journal, Transcript, Educational Journal, etc.; William Coveney, Mrs. James T. Field, Olive Wright, Susan Fessenden, William H. Baldwin, Henry B. Blackwell, President Timothy Dwight, with the faculty of Yale University; president and faculty of Williams College, J. B. Mason, ex-Senator from Rhode Island; A. P. Martin, ex-mayor of Boston; Walter M. Guild, Julius H. Ward, Henry J. Thayer, Frank A. Allen, ex-mayor of Cambridge; John C. Haynes, president, and Julius H. Tutle, treasurer, Massachusetts Historical and Genealogical Society; W. H. Hart, colonel Thirty-sixth Colored Regiment (war record); W. T. Shapleigh, editor (old-line abolitionist); Westley Jones, A. Shuman, Noah A. Plimpton, John C. Paige, Levi P. Lawrence, superior and Sisterhood of the Home at the Cathedral, Charles Sydney Smith, ex-mayor of Providence; Morris H. Richardson, M. D.; Samuel J. Mixter, M. D.; David W. Cheever, M. D.; Samuel Durgin, president Massachusetts board of health; William P. Wesselhoeft, M. D.; James D. Bell, M. D.; Hasket Derby, M. D.; Prof. Grover Robinson, Mrs. John Boyle O'Reilly, Alfred Hemenway, George H. Marcoe, dean Massachusetts College of Pharmacy; John Dana Hubbell, Joseph H. Manley, and a very large number of physicians, clergymen, and leading educators from different parts of the country.

In my former attempt in this direction I introduced a joint resolution which I will not now read, but will ask permission to introduce it into the RECORD. As before suggested, it proposed to appoint a commission for the purpose of investigating this matter with a view of selecting a site and recommending its cession by Executive proclamation to the very worthy men and women who were then engaged in this great philanthropic movement. That joint resolution was in these terms:

SECTION 1. That the President of the United States shall appoint a commission consisting of three persons, two of whom shall be physicians, whose duty it shall be to select a site, and make report thereon to the President, for the establishment of a national sanitarium for the treatment of pulmonary diseases, said location to be in some one of the Territories of the United States and upon such of the public lands as may be unoccupied.

SEC. 2. That the commission so appointed shall, within six months after their appointment, report to the President of the United States where, in their best judgment, is the proper place to establish said sanitarium, together with the boundaries of the land whereon to establish the same, and also rules and regulations suited for the government of the same.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of such report the President shall by proclamation withdraw the lands described in said report from sale, and from preemption, homestead, or other entry or sale, and shall reserve the same for the purpose of said sanitarium.

SEC. 4. That the surveyors-general of the several Territories shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, make such surveys and render such assistance to said commission as the said commission may desire.

SEC. 5. That the traveling expenses, fares, and other expenses incident to the selecting and reporting upon such site shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, upon vouchers properly certified, and the said commissioners shall each be paid $10 per day for each and every day they shall be actually employed on such duty.

SEC. 6. That $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of said commission, their expenses, fares, clerk hire, and all other matters connected with or growing out of the selecting and reporting said site.

Mr. President, the present purpose is to secure by direct cession to the American Invalid Aid Society of Boston property now owned by the Government. This organization has for its object the amelioration, so far as may be possible, of those who are suffering from pulmonary diseases in the North, and who may be benefited by a change of climate to the more salubrious atmosphere of the Rocky Mountain region. The society has in view at the present time the Fort Stanton Military Reservation, situated in New Mexico, which reservation has been recently abandoned by the United States Government. I will state that when the call for bills is reached I shall introduce a bill which provides that that military reservation shall be ceded by the Government to this society.

Mr. President, very much has been written during the past two years and since this agitation was commenced concerning this philanthropic movement. Dr. William P. Roberts, the managing editor of Folk Lore and Best Thoughts, published in Minneapolis, has given this movement the benefit of his facile pen, and Dr. C. F. Nichols, of Boston, an eminent medical gentleman, has contributed exceedingly interesting articles on the subject to the Review of Reviews and to the newspaper press.

I have here an article of exceeding interest from the Boston Traveller of January 25, 1896, discussing this subject, which is of sufficient interest to be introduced in this discussion:

WORKING WONDERS—WHAT THE INVALID AID SOCIETY COULD DO WITH MONEY ENOUGH—GIVES HOPE TO CONSUMPTIVES—A SCHEME OF COLONIZATION OF NEW MEXICO IN EMBRYO WHICH WOULD BE OF GREAT BENEFIT TO THE COUNTRY'S HEALTH.

The announcement that Mrs. Etta Fish Tingley is to repeat her famous song lecture in Chickering Hall, February 12, for the benefit of the Invalid Aid Society has brought forth from many busy people who were not in touch with all the philanthropical movements of the day inquiries concerning the society.

Its object was partially revealed in its title, but the great value of the work it has done and is still doing and its hopes and plans for the future could only be gleaned from somebody intimately connected with the work.

The society was incorporated in Massachusetts and Ohio three years ago. Dr. Edward Everett Hale is entitled to the honor of its existence, for he practically formed it a year before its incorporation, and is its president pro tempore, there having been a vacancy in the head office since the last annual meeting. Louis C. Southard and Hezekiah Butterworth are the vice-presidents, and E. H. Clement, Edwin Ginn, and Leon M. Abbett are the trustees. There are other officers in the society, not an executive board nor an advisory board, but rather a combination of the two, and near the head of the list is found the name of Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, while Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. James T. Field, Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden, and the mother superior and all the sisters of the Home for Destitute Catholic Children are among those strongly interested in the society. Hon. John D. Long, Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire; Rev. Dr. David Gregg, of Brooklyn; Gen. Charles W. Darling, of Utica, N. Y.; Rev. Dr. John L. Withrow, of Chicago; Governor L. Bradford Prince, of New Mexico; Hon. A. P. Lovejoy, of Wisconsin; Hon. Charles W. Loring, of Minneapolis; Rev. Minot Savage, the Upham Bros., of the Youth's Companion, and S. W. Manning, manager of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, are among the officers. Col. A. A. Pope has given $500 to the society as a mark of his interest, and such men as Dr. Albert Shaw, A. Shuman, Col. W. W. Bunting, Noah A. Plympton, John C. Paige, Jeremiah Williams, Dr. Samuel Durgin, George P. Lawrence, the president of the State senate; Hon. William E. Russell, Gen. A. P. Martin, Alfred Hemenway, W. H. Baldwin, Dr. James B. Bell, Dr. Hasket Duby, Senator Mason of Rhode Island, and Bishop Whipple of Minnesota, are either members of the society or aids to its work. One of the hardest workers in the society of 200 or more members is Dr. C. F. Nichols, the editor of Folk Lore, one of the editors of Science, and a well-known writer for many of the best magazines. He has obtained a large number of influential people as signers of the petition for land, and has personally superintended much of the business of the society.

And now to its object. It conducts a system of beneficient service to the class of invalids most numerous and pitiable in the Eastern and Northern States—the consumptives. Beginning at the root of their trouble, all expert physicians are convinced that efforts to produce cures are useless as long as victims of tubercular disease remain in damp and changeable climates. Phosphates, cod liver oil, or any other medicines are as unstable as water. Meanwhile the means provided for comfort or refuge for the poorer classes, who are thrown upon public or private charity, are inadequate. Refused at the hospitals, there is nowhere near room enough for the vast number in the establishments thus far provided, and such as gain admission to the homes for incurables do not last very long. The annual death list from consumption in this country is about 100,000, and a large percentage of this number could be saved by being sent to parts of the country where the curative qualities of the climate have been tested. It has long been known that tuberculous disease does not flourish in certain localities. Between 300 and 400 invalids have already been sent away by the society, and in many, if not all, of the cases the disease has been checked. New Mexico heads the list of localities with subtle curative qualities, defying chemical analysis, but pervading the earth and air of these dry drained places, but Colorado and North Carolina are included, as well as certain parts of Florida.

The property known as the Moses Lyman estate, near Jacksonville, Fla., belongs to the association, and it is thought in Congress that the prospect of obtaining from the Government a valuable property at Las Cruces, N. Mex., is hopeful. This property is Stanton Park, which has been held as a Government reserve for disabled soldiers, but its usefulness in that direction is over, and it was to have been given up the 1st of January. Perhaps the war scare had some effect upon that decision, for it is still retained. It consists of many acres of land, irrigated, which is an important item in that Territory, and a number of fine, large buildings in good repair. A petition is being signed by all the prominent names in many States to secure grants of land in New Mexico for the use of consumptives, who may find in the peculiar climate of that Territory health and usefulness, and the gift of Stanton Park is expected as an answer to that petition, particularly as the people of New Mexico are desirous of forming new colonies. Senator GALLINGER has already interested Congress in the subject by an address full of practical points, the best of which was made by placing the work of the society on a basis of sound political economy. He declared that it sent away the unproductive people of one State and gave other States the same number of productive people. No offense being intended toward invalids, it is still true that figures are eloquent in showing the cost to the State of any unproductive class of its citizens.

No prejudice of sect appears in the work and there is no plan to save souls except incidentally. The desire is to rescue without loss of time the sensitive bodies of consumptives. The past work speaks for itself. The future is filled with plans which include the continuance of the work of the past, the publication of papers upon the subjects of importance to consumptives, and the arrangements to supply information to physicians and laymen not informed upon problems of climatology—free information, and charts and maps at a moderate price. Last, but by no means least, the society will provide money for poor applicants as soon as its financial condition will permit, and will furnish homes and opportunities for work that the invalids may become self-supporting as soon as possible. It also proposes to establish sometime small colonies or sanitariums, of tents or isolated houses—a hospital system which has been successful in Belgium and in army practice. Land is offered by President Diaz in Mexico and by land owners in several favored neighborhoods. But all that calls for money and the establishment of a permanent fund, and that must necessarily be slow work unless States, societies, and individuals take up the matter.

I have also a letter dated Las Cruces, N. Mex., from a young man who was sent there by this society, and who has recovered complete health from a condition that was supposed to be hopeless in the latitude of New England. I understand that several of those already sent to the Rocky Mountain region by the Invalid Aid Society have been greatly benefited.

In my former remarks on this question I called attention to the fact that there are a great many precedents for this kind of legislation. The former joint resolution was criticised in certain quarters and by certain newspapers, one great newspaper of the country saying it was paternalism run mad, the claim being made that a proposition to ask the Government to do anything for a certain class of invalids is an absurdity and ought not for a moment to be entertained.

On that occasion I called attention to the fact that we have Homes for seamen established by the Government; that we have National Homes for Disabled Volunteers established by the Government; that we have an institution for the deaf and dumb in the District of Columbia supported by the Government; that we have set apart two sections of land in each township for public schools; that we have a reservation of mines, salines, timber, and water under other sections of the statute for sundry uses; that we have even allowed John Chamberlin the privilege to erect a hotel on the Government reservation at Fortress Monroe; that we have national cemeteries established and sustained by the Government; that the legislation concerning the hot springs of Arkansas is a recognition of the principle involved in the proposed legislation; and that by sections 2474 to 2477 the vast territory known as the Yellowstone Park, with all its natural wonders, has been set apart and provision made for its protection for purposes of pleasure and for purposes of pleasure alone. I then called attention to the fact that in addition to the Yellowstone Park we have the General Grant National Park, the Sequoia National Park, and the Yosemite National Park, in the State of California, covering a million acres of land, and those parks are established and maintained as pleasure grounds for the people of the United States. I took occasion at that time likewise to call attention to the fact that we have by legislation provided for the treatment of precisely this class of cases in domestic animals, and that we have appropriated millions of dollars through the Bureau of Animal Industry for this very purpose. A few days ago when the Agricultural appropriation bill was under consideration, if I remember correctly, more than half a million dollars was appropriated out of the public Treasury for the purpose of treating pleuro-pneumonia and similar diseases in the domestic animals of this country, and nobody objected to it.

Mr. President, the purpose of the friends of this measure is to do something for the men and women and especially for the youths of this country who are suffering and dying from this same terrible disease. I said in the remarks that I had the honor of submitting nearly four years ago in this body that a distinguished sanitarian of this country had made a computation—I will not vouch for its correctness—but he made a computation that the mortality from consumption in Vermont, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island is 25 in every 100; that in Connecticut, Delaware, the District of Columbia, New Jersey, and New York it is 20 in 100; that in Maryland, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Washington it is 16 in 100; that in California, Indiana, Kentucky, Minnesota, and Wisconsin it is 14 in 100; that in Dakota, Iowa, Oregon, Tennessee, and Virginia it is 12 in 100; that in Illinois it is 11 in 100; that in Nebraska, Missouri, and Montana it is 9 in 100; that in Colorado, Kansas, Louisiana, and North Carolina it is 8 in 100; that in Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, and Utah it is 6 in 100; that in Arkansas, South Carolina, and Texas it is 5 in 100, and that in

New Mexico it is only 3 in 100, and the mortality in New Mexico comprises not only what would actually come to the inhabitants of that Territory, but likewise includes the numerous persons suffering from pulmonary diseases who go to that salubrious climate from our Northern communities in search of health. If I remember correctly, only a few weeks ago a statement was made in one of the newspapers of this city that 70 per cent of the deaths of that week occuring in the District of Columbia were due to diseases of the respiratory system in one form or another. These figures show that the mortality from this class of cases in the country has reached a point that is a matter of actual alarm to the people who are desirous to ameliorate it, some of whom are willing to give of their time and of their money to accomplish this very desirable result.

The American Invalid Aid Society of Boston, Mass., is a voluntary organization, composed of private individuals who have already contributed largely of their means, who are sending young men and young women from our northern country to the Rocky Mountain region and paying their expenses for the purpose of trying to do something for them in the direction of giving them health and rescuing them from this disease, which is ordinarily incurable in our northern latitudes.

It seems to me that the Congress of the United States may well pause, and, following the precedent that has been established in the matter of legislation for the Bureau of Animal Industry, contribute something out of the funds of the public Treasury, if need be, although that is not asked at the present time, for the purpose of rescuing our people from the ravages of pulmonary diseases. After having given millions of dollars out of the public Treasury for the purpose of treating our domestic animals and saving the herds of the country from a similar fatality, it seems strange that Congress should not be equally willing to do something in the line suggested by the petitioners. I can not but believe that a ready response will come to this appeal from the benevolent and philanthropic people of the country.

Mr. President, I have taken quite too much time in presenting this matter, but my personal interest in it is very strong. I am glad to see that the philanthropic people of this country, the physicians, the clergymen, the educators, the men connected with our great newspapers as well, are being thoroughly aroused to this subject. There is, in my judgment, already in this country a sentiment and a feeling that will warrant any reasonable action on the part of Congress looking to the doing of something in the direction that I have indicated.

As I have already stated, when the order of bills is reached I shall introduce a bill, to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for their consideration, looking to the cession of the abandoned Fort Stanton Military Reservation, in New Mexico, to the American Invalid Aid Society of Boston, and I will close by quoting a paragraph from my former remarks on this subject:

> After all, the highest and noblest purposes of government are to secure the happiness and prosperity of the people, and surely no legislation can be thought of that promises so much for the well-being of a large class of our citizens as that for which I plead. All over our land the Macedonian cry is heard, and with anxious heart and earnest hope the stricken ones plead for national sympathy and national help. Surely that cry will not go unheeded; surely that help will not be withheld.

Mr. President, I move that the petitions which I have presented be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Henry W. Voss, of the National Game, Bird, and Fish Protective Association, and sundry other citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 5729, to regulate interstate traffic in wild game; which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented the petition of H. L. Potter, late colonel Seventy-first Regiment New York State Militia, praying that the pay of veterans in departmental or other service of the United States may not be stopped for less than six months' absence on account of sickness or disability; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Island City Lodge, No. 388, International Association of Machinists, of Moline, Ill., praying for an investigation into the condition of machinists employed at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard, and other navy-yards in the country; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRICE presented a petition of 55 citizens of Canton, Ohio; a petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, and a petition of 17 citizens of Columbus, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation giving to second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the National Game, Bird, and Fish Protective Association, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the interstate-commerce law, prohibiting common carriers from transporting any game for sale, for market, or for storage out of such States and Territories as have nonexport laws; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BAKER presented additional papers to accompany an amendment submitted by him March 18, 1896, intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2454) restoring the Santee Sioux Indians, of Nebraska, and the Flandreau Sioux Indians, of South Dakota, formerly known as and being a confederacy of the Medawakanton and Wapakoota Sioux Indians, to all rights, privileges, and benefits enjoyed by them and their ancestors under the treaties of 1837 and 1851, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Lands, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 698) to provide for the erection of an additional fireproof building for the National Museum, heretofore reported from that committee.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1781) making an appropriation to furnish flags for the schoolhouses of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2321) to authorize and regulate the sale of unclaimed freight, baggage, and other property in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2359) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures to be used in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5363) authorizing the construction of a fog signal on the north pier of the entrance to Menominee Harbor, Wisconsin, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 55) for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal station at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, New Jersey, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1135) to amend the act creating the circuit courts of appeals, and for other purposes, to report adversely thereon.

I will state that what is contained in this bill has been passed by the Senate in other bills with the exception of one section. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1619) to enlarge the jurisdiction of United States commissioners;

A bill (S. 2534) to amend section 4193 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the record of bills of sale, mortgages, hypothecations, and conveyances of vessels; and

A bill (S. 2561) amending section 5347 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to offenses by masters and officers of American vessels.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2263) to provide for the settlement of accounts and claims in certain cases, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2546) concerning the court of appeals in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 811) to provide a district attorney and a marshal for the western judicial district of the State of South Carolina, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2346) to prescribe the times and places of holding the district court of the United States in and for the district of Alaska, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PLATT. On Friday last I reported from the Committee on Patents an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations without printing. I present the same amendment now, and ask that it may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PLATT. From the Committee on Indian Affairs, I propose an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the Indian service, and ask that it may be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It is an important amendment. It deals with the condition of affairs in the Indian Territory and authorizes the commissioners already appointed to perform additional service.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 835) making an appropriation to survey the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2284) for the relief of homestead settlers in Gregory County, S. Dak., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 687) to apply the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3013) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to improve the merchant marine engineer service and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve, to report it with an amendment, the amendment being a substitute for the House bill. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment, which is a substitute, may be adopted and that then the House bill as amended may take the place of Order of Business 379, being the bill (S. 1242) to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant marine engineer service, and thereby, also, to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve, and that the Senate bill on the Calendar be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

MEMORIAL OF THE NATIONAL WOOL GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 5th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 17 of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, being the memorial of the National Wool Growers' Association; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

REPORT ON NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL on the 5th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 12,000 additional copies of the report of the Board of Engineers relative to the construction and completion of the Nicaragua Canal, without maps; of which 4,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY THE PEOPLE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the matter of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the election of Senators by the people be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on the 20th instant, is as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred S. R. 6, being "Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of Senators by the votes of the qualified electors of the States," having had the same under consideration, beg to submit the following report:

Article V of the Constitution of the United States provides, among other things, as follows:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

It is in pursuance of this grant of power the pending amendment has been submitted.

The men who framed the Constitution, conceding the probable necessity of amendments in the future, did not leave the question either as to the right to amend or the mode of doing it an open one, but in the provision just quoted wisely provided the means and the manner whereby amendments could be made. What, therefore, are some of the more weighty reasons why this amendment should be deemed advisable and what, if any, are the objections that may be properly urged against its adoption? Before proceeding, however, to a statement of some of the reasons in favor of this proposed change in the manner of electing Senators of the United States, reference will be made to one or two principal objections thereto.

The first objection is the general one that no change in the fundamental law should for any reason be attempted. That no change should be made, except for the gravest of reasons, is conceded by your committee; but the fact that already the Congress and the legislatures of a sufficient number of States have decided as to the necessity of fifteen different amendments ought to be of itself a sufficient answer to the general objection that the fundamental law should not for any reason be interfered with.

Recognizing, therefore, the fact that reasons to be assigned for any proposed change should be of the most cogent nature, well grounded and unassailable, your committee have approached the consideration of the pending proposition with a full appreciation of the gravity of the subject and of the importance of the public interests involved. That any change in any of the provisions of the general charter should be made for any mere trivial cause, or on account of any mere sentiment, is a proposition to which your committee could not accede.

THE RELATION WHICH THE STATES RESPECTIVELY BEAR TO THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT IS NOT AFFECTED BY THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The principal objection is based upon the false theory that a change in the manner of electing Senators will operate to change the nature of the organization of our Government, and of the relations not only which the States bear to the Federal Union but also the relations which Senators bear to the States respectively and to the people of those States. This proposed amendment, says one, is an invasion of the principle which it is claimed was established by the Constitution, that the Senate represents the States in their sovereign or political capacity, rather than the people of the States collectively or otherwise. It is urged that this is fundamental, and, furthermore, that it is as important to the proper maintenance of governmental equilibrium and the theory upon which our Government is founded as it is fundamental. But however well founded may be the contention—and this is not controverted by your committee—that United States Senators are the representatives of the States in their political or sovereign capacity rather than of the people, it is a mistake, and a very prevalent one, to suppose that the change in the mode of choosing Senators would be an invasion of this doctrine or destructive in the slightest degree of that relation which was established between United States Senators and the States they represent by the adoption of the Constitution.

The proposed amendment does not propose to interfere in any manner whatever with the fundamental law, save and except in the one particular, namely, as to the mode in which the several States shall choose their Senators. No issue is made by the proposed amendment with those who regard the Senate as the especial representative of the States in their sovereign capacity, a part of whose duty it is to see that the States respectively are not denied any of the rights to which they are justly entitled under our system of government. That is a question no element of which is included in the proposed amendment. It simply relates to the mode in which the States respectively shall choose their Senators—whether by the legislatures or by the people.

The proposed amendment does not in the slightest degree trench upon the system upon which our Government is founded. The doctrine that Senators are the representatives of the States as such may be admitted without question; but it is one nevertheless which does not grow out of or in any manner depend upon the mode by which Senators are elected, but wholly and entirely on the equal ratio of representation to which each State is entitled in the Senate of the United States. The share of representation to be accorded each State in the Senate is one thing, and the mode or manner of selecting that representation, whatever it may be, is quite another and different thing. The one—the former—relates to the question that Senators are more particularly the representatives of the States in their political capacity; while the other relates only to what perhaps may by some be considered the more unimportant matter, as to how and by whom the States shall choose this representation, whether by their legislatures or by a direct vote of the people.

A careful review of the debates when the Constitution was under consideration will disclose the fact that the question as to whether the Senate should represent the States in their political capacity or the people arose not in the consideration of the question as to the manner in which Senators should be elected, but rather in considering the question as to the ratio of representation in this body to which each State should be entitled. The contest on this important question was one of immense importance and much gravity in the Constitutional Convention, the contest being between the large and more populous States on the one hand and the smaller and less populous States on the other. The propositions submitted and discussed relating to this important subject were numerous. One was that each State should have a representation in the Senate according to its importance as a State; a second was that the representation should be in proportion to their property, respectively, while a third was that of equal representation; that is to say, that each State, whether large or small, rich or poor, near or distant, weak or powerful, populous or otherwise, should have in the Senate of the United States precisely the same representation, the same voice, as each and every other

State, however wide might be the difference as to important property rights population, wealth, influence, or power.

After much discussion the last-mentioned proposition was finally agreed upon, namely, that each State should have precisely the same representation in the Senate of the United States, and in that decision, and not in the decision as to the mode or manner of electing Senators, is to be found the declaration of the doctrine that the Senate represents the States in their political or sovereign capacity rather than the people of the States.

The question as to whether the Senate should be the representative of the States rather than of the people was one upon which there was a wide diversity of opinion among the different members of the Constitutional Convention. Mr. Madison held strongly the affirmative of the proposition, and declared in terms that "the Senate does not represent the people, but the States in their political capacity"; while others, notably Mr. Wilson of Pennsylvania, held the contrary view. The large preponderance of sentiment, however, seemed to be in accord with the opinion held by Mr. Madison. Whatever might be the present view, however, or the different views in reference to this matter, it is perfectly clear to your committee that a change in the mode or manner of selecting Senators would not in the slightest manner interfere with it.

The convention having decided that the representation in the Senate should be equally apportioned as between all the States, another and scarcely less important one came up for consideration, and various were the propositions submitted and considered as to the number of Senators each State should have. Many of the members preferred a small number, and one Senator from each State was urged by many members as the proper number, while others advocated three as a proper number. Gouverneur Morris, of New York, insisted on three for each State and submitted a motion to that effect. In support of it he said: "If two only should be allowed to each State and a majority be made a quorum, the power would be lodged in fourteen members, which was too small a number for such a trust"; and finally, after long and able discussion, it was agreed that each State should be entitled to two Senators, and a provision to that effect became a part of the fundamental law, has remained a part of it ever since, and, in the opinion of your committee, is, and forever should be, unchangeable.

It is therefore made apparent to your committee that the question as to whether the Senate of the United States should be regarded as the representative of the States, respectively, in their political capacity, rather than as the representative of the people of the States, was determined in so far as that question ever has been determined, not by the mode or manner in which Senators should be chosen, not in the determination as to the number of Senators that each State should have, but rather in the consideration and determination of the question as to the fixed ratio of representation that each State should have in respect to all its sister States in the Senate of the United States. Therefore the objection is not tenable that any proposed change in the mode of electing Senators can be properly regarded as an attempt to deprive the States, respectively, as States, in their sovereign or political capacity, of their legal representation in the Senate of the United States.

NO CHANGE IN OUR SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT IS SUGGESTED BY THIS AMENDMENT.

The proposed amendment suggests no change whatever in our system of government in respect to the relations of the different departments to each other. It neither recommends nor provides for any departure from the established relations between the two branches of the legislative department of the Government or from the existing relation that the Senate of the United States bears to the States, respectively. Nor does it suggest any change in the relation of the States to the General Government. It does propose a change, however, in the mode—only this, nothing more—by which the States, respectively, and the people thereof shall choose their representatives in the Senate of the United States. Under the present provisions of the Constitution they are chosen by the legislatures of the States, respectively. The proposed amendment will change this, so that instead of the legislatures the people or qualified electors of a State shall elect the Senators from such State.

WHY ARE NOT THE PEOPLE, THE QUALIFIED ELECTORS OF A STATE, THE PROPER MOUTHPIECE OF THE STATE IN THE ELECTION OF SENATORS?

But conceding, for the argument, the correctness of the doctrine that Senators are the representatives of the States in their sovereign or political capacity, who, let us inquire, are more justly entitled to a direct voice in the selection of the men who shall, if you please, represent the States, respectively, in their sovereign or political capacity in the Senate, defend their rights, maintain their dignity, assert their prerogatives, uphold their integrity, and demand and insist upon the proper enforcement of their chartered rights than the people—the qualified electors of those States? That is the precise question involved in the proposed constitutional amendment.

Who are more entitled to speak for the State than the people of that State in their individual and collective capacity as qualified electors? And if entitled to speak, then why not directly and for themselves, and not through their representatives in State legislatures?

The proposition to elect by the people is, it is believed, elemental as well as fundamental when considered in connection with the underlying principle upon which individual suffrage is based. His right to vote, accorded to the citizen for all legislative officers, which can not be denied or abridged, either by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, carries with it the implication, except that implication is destroyed by another provision of the Constitution, the right to exercise such privilege not only freely but directly, not through the medium of a vicarious agent. Members of the National House of Representatives and United States Senators are, under our system, recognized as elective officers, as contradistinguished from those Federal judges, for instance, who do not come within that category, but are appointed.

But in all elective officers, as above stated, each individual voter has a special interest, which it is presumed he has under our general system of suffrage a right to promote at the polls. That right, it is submitted, should not be charged with restrictions which prevent its full, fair, and effective exercise. What the citizen is permitted to do as hereinbefore stated, indirectly and through the means of a vicarious agent in the matter of suffrage, he should be permitted to do, it is respectfully submitted, directly and in his own right and in his own proper person. If the individual voter has any interest to be represented by a Senator of the United States apart from that general interest he has in the maintenance of the dignity and the preservation of the rights of the State in its sovereign or political capacity—and he doubtless has, or at least should have—and if he has a right to represent that interest in any manner whatever at the ballot box, as it is believed he has or should have, then, in the opinion of your committee, he should be permitted to do so directly.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT IS A JUST TRIBUTE TO THE INTELLIGENCE AND INTEGRITY OF THE INDIVIDUAL VOTER.

One weighty and principal objection to the present system of electing Senators by the legislatures of the respective States is that the power and right of the individual voter are hedged about and circumscribed, his will is manacled, his volition paralyzed; he can not vote for his choice. He can not, in fact, vote directly at all, but must content himself with casting a vote for members of the legislature, who may or may not properly represent his wishes in the vote they may cast for Senator. It carries with it the implication that the people, the qualified voters of a State, are, for some reason, unfit for the full exercise of the elective franchise, except in a qualified and largely restricted sense. The present system is in practice, purpose, and effect a declaration that for some occult reason, which is in no way made manifest, it is unsafe and prejudicial to the public interests to commit the election of Senators to a vote of the people.

The present system is a reflection either upon the honesty, the capacity, or both, of the voting class of the several States, while its tendency to wound the sensibilities of the voter in depriving him of his right as a sovereign to vote directly for his choice, and thus in a measure separating the people from the choice of the legislature and impairing the harmony and unity of feeling which ought to exist between the masses of the people and their representatives, whether of the House or Senate, is plainly manifest.

THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT IS AN ENLARGEMENT OF THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE ON THE PART OF THOSE ENTITLED TO ITS EXERCISE UNDER EXISTING LAWS, AND IT TENDS TO RENDER IMPOSSIBLE THE USE OF IMPROPER METHODS TO INFLUENCE SENATORIAL ELECTIONS.

No system, in the opinion of your committee, can be properly termed free or republican which deprives the individual voter of his right to cast his vote directly for the man of his choice for any legislative office, whether it be for member of a State legislature, Member of the National House of Representatives, or United States Senator.

Again, while it is possible that the inducements of a wealthy and unscrupulous aspirant for Senatorial honors may reach and improperly influence the majority of a small body in the legislature, such a thing would be absolutely impossible were the decision left to the great mass of voters.

THE MATERIAL INTERESTS OF THE STATE SUFFER BY REASON OF PROTRACTED SENATORIAL CONTESTS IN THE LEGISLATURE, WHICH ARE OF FREQUENT OCCURRENCE.

Another unanswerable objection, as it seems to your committee, to the present system of electing Senators is to be found in the great length of time frequently consumed by the legislature of a State in the election of a Senator and the consequent distraction of the legislative mind from business which all agree properly belongs to such a body, to say nothing of the strife, ill feeling, and contention that too often follow necessarily in the wake of such contests. How frequently is it the case that these contests are carried on not only for weeks, but sometimes for months, during the whole session of a legislature, to the great detriment of other important public business, to say nothing of the expense to the State that must necessarily accrue. Why, then, not have the election of Senators determined on a day fixed and certain, as in the case of members of the House?

It seems to your committee that the history of Senatorial elections in a number of States in the last few years, resulting in several cases in contests prolonged throughout the entire session of the legislatures and in failures to elect, and in other cases in similar contests occupying a great portion of the time of the entire sessions of the legislatures, ought of itself to be a convincing argument in favor of the proposed change in the manner of electing United States Senators.

The long contest in the legislature of the State of New York a few years ago has not been forgotten. The contest before the legislature of the State of Oregon of the session of 1882 extended through the entire session, resulting in an election at the last moment of the session. A similar contest occurred in the last Oregon legislature—to the great detriment of the public business. In 1892-93 the legislatures of the States of Washington, Montana, and Wyoming were severally engaged from the beginning to the end of the sessions of said legislatures in endeavors to elect United States Senators—one in Washington, one in Montana, and one in Wyoming—the effort in each case proving an entire failure and resulting in the appointment of a Senator from each of those States by the governors of the States, respectively, which appointees, after protracted contest in the United States Senate, were denied admittance. Again, in the last Idaho legislature, also in that of Washington, the greater portion of each session was involved in protracted struggles over the election of Senator. The recent contest before the legislature of the State of Delaware is fresh in the public mind, resulting in the claim now pending of Mr. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate, while the daily reports of the contest in the legislature of the State of Kentucky, resulting as it has, after weary months of fruitless balloting, in a failure to elect, adds strength to the proposition of your committee.

But another vital objection to the election of Senators by the legislature and in favor of the change proposed must be apparent to all. How frequently is it true that in the selection of members of a State legislature, at a time when such legislature has as one of its duties the election of a Senator, every consideration is lost sight of except the solitary one as to how candidates if elected will vote on the question of the Senatorship. Will they vote for this man or that man, or against this one or the other one, are the principal questions asked. These are the issues in such a campaign, while the question as to the candidate's qualifications for the business of general legislation or the views he entertains with reference to the great material interests of the State—internal improvements, assessments, taxation, revenue, corporations, appropriations, trusts, municipal affairs, salaries and fees of officers, civil and criminal code, apportionment, and other like important subjects—are wholly lost sight of. Who does not believe that not unfrequently are the most vital interests of the State made to suffer, and in a marked degree, from the very fact that the question of the election of a Senator is a distracting and disturbing element, not only in the selection of members of the legislature, but also in the legislature itself?

PUBLIC OPINION DEMANDS THE CHANGE.

But not among the least objections to the present system, and one which should not be ignored or passed over lightly, is the fact that there is great unrest in the public mind on this question. Popular opinion has taken hold of the subject, and the demand for this change is loud and emphatic; pronounced, as it is imperative; earnest, as it seems to be, almost unanimous, among the great masses of the people. The belief in the public mind is rapidly gaining that proper deference is not given by the Senate of the United States to the demands and interests of the people, and that is largely due to the fact that Senators do not owe their positions to the people, who are permanent, but to the legislatures, which are transient.

It is quite immaterial as to whether this belief in the public mind is well founded or otherwise. It exists, and there is, in the judgment of your committee, but one means of removing it, and that is by a change in the mode of electing Senators, by which the qualified electors of each State shall have the right to vote directly for their choice for Senator. Restrictions of any kind upon the right of those entitled under the law to the elective franchise in a republic which tend to prevent a full, fair, and direct expression at the ballot box of the will of each individual voter, whether native or foreign born, white or black, are obnoxious to the great fundamental idea upon which a free government is based. And not the least offensive of any of the restrictions now imposed under our present system is, as has been indicated in this report, that which deprives the individual voter of the right to cast his vote directly, and without circumlocution through vicarious instrumentalities, for his choice for United States Senators; and not until this restriction is removed will our Republic rise to the true dignity and grandeur implied in the phrase "An absolutely free and independent representative government"—representative in its character as much in the mode of electing its rulers and lawmakers as in the making, interpretation, and execution of its laws.

THE RAPID GROWTH OF PUBLIC OPINION IN FAVOR OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

For the purpose of showing the marvelously rapid growth within the limits of Congress alone of the sentiment in favor of this proposed change in the matter of electing United States Senators, attention is attracted to the following record facts:

During the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, which convened December, 1887, an amendment to the Constitution of this character was submitted by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. No action was taken thereon at this session, except a reference to the appropriate committee. This amendment was again introduced by Mr. MITCHELL at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress. The first speech ever delivered in either House of Congress in support of such an amendment was delivered in the Senate by Mr. MITCHELL in support of his proposed amendment on April 22, 1890. The amendment was then referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but no action was taken thereon.

Subsequently, at this same session, but one other similar amendment was introduced in the Senate. This was by Senator Reagan of Texas, on April 17, 1890, which was also referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and no action taken thereon. During the session (first session Fifty-first Congress) eight similar proposed amendments were introduced in the House of Representatives by as many different Representatives from as many different States. No action was taken, however, except an adverse report on one was made from the Judiciary Committee through Mr. Hammond of Georgia.

At the first session of the Fifty-second Congress three similar amendments were proposed in the Senate—one by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, introduced December 10, 1891, and on that day on his motion referred to your committee; another by Senator TURPIE of Indiana, introduced on the same day, December, 10, 1891, and on his motion laid on the table. This resolution was, on December 17, 1891, on Senator TURPIE's motion, taken up for consideration, for the purpose of enabling him to address the Senate in support of it, when on that day he made an extended argument in its support (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD); after which, on his motion, it was referred to your committee; the third being joint resolution (S. R. 37) presented by Senator PALMER of Illinois February 2, 1892.

In the House of Representatives at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress no less than 17 similar amendments were introduced into that body by as many different Representatives of the people, representing as many different States. In this Fifty-second Congress, on January 16, 1893, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, similar to that now reported by your committee, passed the National House of Representatives by over a two-thirds vote, while in the Fifty-third Congress 3 similar amendments were presented in the Senate and 12 in the House by as many members, and on July 21, 1894, one of these amendments passed the House, the vote being—yeas 141, nays 50. But this formidable movement in Congress in favor of this change is not surprising when the fact is stated that nine States—Oregon, California, Idaho, Iowa, Wisconsin, Indiana, Kansas, Wyoming, and last, but not least, the great State of Ohio—have through their legislatures instructed in favor of this amendment.

PUBLIC OPINION ON THIS SUBJECT HAS UNDERGONE A MATERIAL CHANGE SINCE THE ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Many restrictions on the right of suffrage in addition to those now recognized by our present system were suggested and strongly urged in the Constitutional Convention by many leading and influential members of that distinguished body. Among these was the proposition to limit the right of suffrage to freeholders, although at that time 9 of the 13 States had extended the right of suffrage beyond freeholders and eliminated this restriction from their State laws.

In the Constitutional Convention, while the opinion that members of the House of Representatives, or the House of Delegates, as it was designated in the original plan, should be elected by the people, largely predominated, there was a very large and influential sentiment to the contrary, and on the final vote in the convention as to whether the members of the House of Representatives should be elected by the people, two States, New Jersey and South Carolina, voted in the negative; the States of Connecticut and Delaware were divided, while Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia voted in the affirmative.

Roger Sherman, of Connecticut; Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, and Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, contended vigorously, ably, and with marked persistency that they should be chosen by the legislatures of the States, respectively, in the same manner substantially as United States Senators are now chosen. Roger Sherman, in the course of the debate, made this declaration: "The people immediately should have as little to do as may be about the Government."

Opposed to these views, however, were James Madison, of Virginia; James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and others. Mr. Madison declared that he "thought that the great fabric to be raised would be more stable and durable if it should rest on the solid foundation of the people themselves than if it should stand merely on the pillars of the legislatures," while James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, in his advocacy of elections by the people, said, "I am in favor of raising the Federal pyramid to a considerable altitude, and for that reason I wish to give it as broad a base as possible. No government can long subsist without the confidence of the people."

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion, it is submitted by your committee that something—indeed, very much—is due to public opinion in this country. It must be quite apparent to all that the prevailing opinions of 1787, as reflected through the records and history of those days, are not the prevailing opinions upon the subject of suffrage, at least not to a very great extent, of the present day. The views held by many, even of the framers of the Constitution, one hundred years ago and over, and which led many of them to suggest in the Constitutional Convention and insist upon such propositions as that the Senate of the United States should be chosen either by the President or by the House of Representatives, that the President and Senators should be chosen for life or during good behavior, and other propositions of like character, are, in the great American mind, in the minds of the great masses of the people to-day, obsolete. The opinions not only of the people of the United States but of the civilized world are rapidly undergoing changes.

The tendency in the public mind—in the mind of the great masses of the people—is away from any sort of vicarious representation in legislative functions; away from every proposition which deprives the people of the right to be heard and heard directly upon the great questions pertaining to government, and in favor, in a word, of a "government by the people and for the people" in the broadest and best sense of that oft-quoted declaration. The people demand a voice in the election of Senators, and such demand, in the judgment of your committee, should be respected. So, whatever may be said to the contrary, whatever may be thought of the sanctity of the Constitution as it stands, it must be admitted by all that the people are becoming restive under its restraints on the right of those entitled under the Constitution and laws to exercise the elective franchise.

The times are changing as the light of republican influence expands and the spirit of true democracy is exalted, and with these changes the voice of the people, in their majesty as sovereigns, is being heard throughout our land. The movement of the people in the interest of the people on this, as on many other questions, is stalwart and universal, and the sooner this great fact is recognized by the representatives of the people the better.

But not only so. It is a fact that must be apparent to all that during recent years an impression, deep-seated and threatening, whether well founded or otherwise, has obtained in the American mind and among the masses of the American people to the effect that the Senate of the United States has become a sort of aristocratic body—too far removed from the people, beyond their reach, and with no especial interest in their welfare. The Senate has in the past few years been assailed, as we believe causelessly, from time to time, by many of the leading and most influential journals of the country of both political parties.

The tendency of public opinion is to disparage the Senate and depreciate its dignity, its usefulness, its integrity, its power. If there is any cause for this tendency in the public mind it should be removed without delay. Although the Senate of the United States should be, and in fact is, the most dignified as well as the most important legislative body in the world, the tendency in public journalism and in the popular mind is in a large degree to detract from its importance, minimize its dignity and power, and cast the spirit of obloquy over and around it and its members. While your committee are of the opinion that the impression which leads to all this is to a very great extent at least not well founded, yet it is a fact that can not be ignored that it exists.

Therefore, in the judgment of your committee, any movement that looks to the right of the people to be heard directly in the election of Senators can not but result beneficially to all concerned.

The adoption of this proposed amendment will, in the judgment of your committee, bring the Senate into more amicable relations with the people. It will remove prejudices now existing which are rapidly becoming deeply and dangerously fastened upon the public mind. It will invoke a spirit of mutual forbearance and respect, as between the Senate and the people, which unfortunately does not now exist to that degree that is desirable. It will restore confidence. It will dissipate all cause, excuse, and pretext for unjust criticism. It will tend to elevate the character, advance the dignity, increase the usefulness, extend the influence, and justly magnify the power of the Senate, and at the same time promote the welfare of all the people of the Republic.

Your committee therefore, after mature consideration and for the reasons herein stated, beg respectfully to report back Senate joint resolution No. 6 with the following verbal amendments in phraseology and recommend its passage.

AMENDMENTS.

First amendment: In line 11, page 1, strike out the word "direct" and insert in lieu thereof the word "plurality."

Second amendment: In lines 14 and 15, page 2, strike out the following words: "and a plurality shall elect."

Third amendment: In line 16, page 2, strike out the following words: "If vacancies happen by registration," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State by resignation."

Fourth amendment: In line 20, page 2, strike out the word "direct."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 2591) for the relief of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Webster, W. Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2592) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 2593) granting to the American Invalid Aid Society, of Boston, Mass., the abandoned Fort Stanton Military Reservation, in New Mexico, for the purpose of a national sanitarium for the treatment of pulmonary diseases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2594) granting an increase of pension to William A. Beckford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 2595) for the relief of George M. Smith, late acting third assistant engineer, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2596) amending the act approved January 5, 1893, relating to the increase of pensions to those who served in the Mexican war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2597) granting a pension to Florinda Clark, of Leavenworth, Kans.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2598) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend chapter 67, volume 23, of the Statutes at Large of the United States"; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2599) to amend section 5399 and section 5406 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to unlawful interference with justice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2600) granting a pension to Mrs. Clifford Neff Fyffe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURPIE (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2601) granting an increase of pension to Ambrose B. Carlton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin introduced a bill (S. 2602) for the relief of James Duke; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 2603) granting a pension to Michael Lannon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 2604) granting to the State of Montana 50,000 acres of land to aid in the establishment and maintenance of an asylum for the blind; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLEN (for Mr. THURSTON) introduced a bill (S. 2605) granting an increase of pension to James M. Simeral; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. THURSTON) introduced a bill (S. 2606) granting a pension to W. P. Snowden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2607) to provide for the erection of buildings to be used for a hall of records, a folding room for the House of Representatives, and for a storage warehouse in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 2608) for the relief of the sureties of Frank A. Webb; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce,

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 106) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 107) to authorize Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, and Prof. Asaph Hall, United States Navy, to accept decorations from the Government of the Republic of France; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 108) relating to the Oregon salt springs grant and lands connected therewith; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. MITCHLELL of Oregon. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That the Department of the Interior shall not dispose of nor patent to anyone whomsoever any lands in Oregon containing salt springs or salt, as saline lands, until the salt grant made to Oregon in its act of admission, February 14, 1859 (5 U. S. Stats., page 384), shall have been fully satisfied by selections thereof and thereunder, to be made by the proper State authorities of the State of Oregon, and title thereto duly perfected.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PEFFER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

WOMAN-SUFFRAGE HEARING.

Mr. CALL (by request of the chairman of the Woman Suffrage Congressional committee) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the report of a hearing before the Committee on Woman Suffrage January 28, 1896.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following notice; which was read:

I hereby give notice of a motion to modify and amend the rules of the Senate, for the purpose of enabling the Senate to dispatch the public business more promptly, by the adoption of the accompanying resolution.

It is proposed hereby to amend Rule XXII by inserting the proposed resolve at the end thereof, and by inserting, after the words "to amend" therein, the words "except as hereafter provided."

GEORGE F. HOAR,
Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding the following:

"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for not less than four days it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever. If the Senate shall decide to close debate the question shall be put upon the pending amendments, upon amendments of which notice shall then be given, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure not more than once, and not exceeding one hour.

After such demand shall have been made by any Senator no other motion shall be in order until the same shall have been voted upon by the Senate, unless the same shall fail to be seconded.

After the Senate shall have decided to close debate no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure, or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

JOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY, ETC.

Mr. GALLINGER. By request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], the chairman of the Committee on the Library, I offer a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be read, printed, and go over under the rule. I will state that the Senator from North Dakota is absent from the city, and expects to be absent for about one month. For that reason he requested me to offer the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives and one other member of the Joint Committee on the Library, to be selected by the two chairmen aforesaid, be, and they are hereby, constituted a subcommittee, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress, for the purpose of inquiring into the condition of the Congressional Library and the Botanic Garden, and to report upon the same at the next session of Congress, with such recommendations as may be deemed advisable; also to report a plan for the organization, custody, and management of the new Library building and the Congressional Library and the Botanic Garden; that the said subcommittee is also authorized to employ a stenographer whenever necessary during the course of the inquiry; that the necessary expenses of the sittings of the subcommittee, including the pay of the stenographer, be taken equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that, where he says these gentlemen be appointed to constitute a subcommittee, the resolution be amended by saying that they be constituted "a joint special committee." They are not a subcommittee at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that a proper suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. The resolution should be modified in another place, as the Senator will observe, so as to read "that said joint special committee be authorized."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is correct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified, in the absence of objection. The resolution as modified will go over.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. KYLE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the stenographer employed to report the hearings before the Committee to Establish the University of the United States of parties interested in the bill (S. 1202) to establish a university of the United States be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

REPORT ON WAR IN CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], proposing to instruct the Committee on Foreign Relations to submit a report relative to the war in Cuba, which comes over from a previous day.

Mr. ELKINS. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. LODGE on the 18th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be, and is hereby, empowered to fully investigate and report upon the administration of the civil-service law in the Government Printing Office as affecting the separation from service of the 35 ex-employees referred to in the printed correspondence furnished the Senate under Senate resolution of January 29, 1896.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CALL. I ask what ground there is for the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. Some time ago an inquiry was introduced in regard to the enforcement of the law in these particular cases, and that inquiry was replied to by the Civil Service Commission. All the papers were laid before the committee. The committee considered the reply and those papers; they also heard informally some testimony, and they voted unanimously for the introduction of this resolution, that they might have proper authority to investigate the question thoroughly.

I was not present at the meeting at which the unanimous vote was passed, but I agree entirely with the action of the committee, and in the absence of the chairman, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], I was requested to introduce the resolution and ask for its passage. It is merely a resolution empowering the committee to make the investigation which it seems to them, on the testimony already before them, ought to be made.

Mr. HILL. When the resolution was brought up before I asked that it might be laid over. I have made inquiry in regard to it. There is no objection to the resolution in the form in which it is presented. It is not to create an investigating committee within the sense in which that term is ordinarily used. In the form in which the resolution is presented I do not conceive that there is any objection to it. The Public Printer, I may state, is entirely willing and desirous that the investigation shall be had if any committee of the Senate desires to make it.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the resolution. I was only attracted by its subject, having found it extremely difficult, owing to the very rigid manner in which the civil service is administered in that department, to obtain any employment for some very meritorious persons.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the resolutions relative to the war in Cuba.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I desired to say a word on the motion before it was put.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Illinois for the purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say that I am very anxious to get up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, but as my colleague [Mr. PALMER] has been already recognized as entitled to the floor upon this question, and has been for some days desirous of speaking upon it, I do not feel like interposing until his speech is concluded. After that I shall hope to get up the appropriation bill for consideration.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw the request for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and allow a vote to be taken upon the conference report.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will excuse me, I did not hear his remark.

Mr. CALL. I expressed the hope that the Senator from Illinois who has charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill will not ask for its consideration, but allow a vote to be taken upon the resolutions in relation to Cuba.

Mr. CULLOM. I am anxious to dispose of the Cuban resolutions, but I can not afford, and I do not think the Senate will be inclined, to allow those resolutions to hang along here indefinitely and be in the way of the appropriation bills that must be passed at this session. If I could be assured that we would dispose of the Cuban resolutions to-day I would not be inclined to interfere with their consideration, but I can not wait longer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state that I am as anxious as anyone could possibly be to have a vote upon the Cuban resolutions, of course after any debate that is desired. So far as I am concerned, I should be glad to have evening sessions, for I do think under the circumstances in which we are situated, with the warfare going on in Cuba, the Senate of the United States owes it to itself, to the ordinary sense of humanity, to dispose of the question. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I shall insist upon it that the Senate shall continue the consideration of the resolutions, and hold evening sessions if necessary until the matter is disposed of.

Mr. PLATT. I will state the trouble about the Cuban resolutions. Three Senators who constituted a conference committee on the part of the Senate agreed without very much deliberation to abandon the resolutions which had been passed by the Senate and to recommend to the Senate that it should pass the resolutions which had been adopted by the other House. I venture to say there are not five Senators in the Senate who approve the House resolutions, but by reason of their being presented to us in a conference report there can be no amendment made here. I suggest to the committee of conference that they recede from their demand that the Senate shall take the House resolutions, which no considerable number of Senators would take except as coming in the guise of a conference report, and present some resolutions which will be acceptable to a majority of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to say to my friend from Connecticut that that course might be followed if we had any assurance whatever that the Senate would then dispose of the report of the conference committee or pass upon the subject in any way whatever, and dispose of it by passing the Senate resolutions again, after disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference, so that the matter may be ended and a vote had upon the question whether we shall recognize the belligerency of the Cubans or not.

Mr. PLATT. I can only speak for one, but so far as I am concerned, I do not believe there would be any great trouble in disposing of the Cuban question if the Committee on Foreign Relations would consent to a disagreement to the conference report and take the matter into consideration again, and after careful consideration present such resolutions to the Senate as they thought a majority of the Senate would favor. I think the members of the committee must be convinced that they can not expect the Senate to agree to resolutions one of which declares that we ought to be entirely neutral with regard to the conflict going on in Cuba and another of which declares exactly the opposite, that we ought to intervene in that conflict.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I have always had the most profound respect for the rules of the Senate——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me a moment?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say that as far as the Committee on Foreign Relations are concerned, we are, as a matter of course, at all times disposed to acquiesce in the judgment of the Senate, and if a vote can be had upon the question of adhering to the Senate resolutions or agreeing to the report of the committee of conference it could be disposed of in a moment, and then, if the report is disagreed to, the matter can be referred again to the committee of conference for such action as it may choose to take.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will submit that request now, and, carrying out his idea, ask unanimous consent that the Senate disagree to the conference report and insist on its resolutions, then what he desires can be accomplished.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then why not have the vote formally taken upon the question whether the report of the conference committee shall be concurred in?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be allowed to make one observation in addition to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has said, if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] will allow me.

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I am willing for one to agree to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], which the committee have agreed to now incorporate as a part of the conference report, if that can be taken by itself; but I do not think it is fair that the Committee on Foreign Relations, having taken up two-thirds or three-quarters of the time consumed in discussion, to ask the Senate to whistle opposition to this matter as it stands down the winds in this way, as seems to be proposed by my honorable friend from Ohio. He says, substantially, "We have been heard, and if you want to be heard, let us save the time and vote without any further debate."

The proposition the Senator last suggested, namely, that the matter should go back for the reconsideration of the committee of conference, can be accomplished if the Senator will ask unanimous consent that the Senate insist on its resolutions and ask for a further conference. If the side represented by the Senator from Ohio will agree to that it can be done in two minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. President, I will make that motion——

Mr. PALMER. I must insist that I have some rights on this floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] is entitled to the floor and claims recognition.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PALMER. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to say a word in regard to the Delaware election case, which, as the Senate is aware, is a question of the highest privilege, and which, I presume, if insisted upon, would have the right of way against the Cuban resolutions, against appropriation bills, and against everything else. I happen to have charge of that matter. Last week I gave way from day to day for speeches on the Cuban resolutions and to other matters. I had expected to be able this morning to insist on proceeding with the Delaware case until finished. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], however, who desires to be heard on the Du Pont case at some length, informs me this morning that he is not in good health, and that he does not feel that he will be able to proceed during the present week. He has made a personal request of me, I having charge of this case, that it may be permitted to go over until next Monday. In view, therefore, of the earnest desire on the part of the Senator from Ohio to go on with the Cuban case, and in view of the further fact that there is an appropriation bill here ready and being pressed, I am willing to consent to that arrangement to accommodate my friend from Mississippi, with this qualification, that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who desires to speak on the Du Pont case and who will be compelled to leave the Senate some time during the present week, shall have an opportunity to make his speech some time during this week.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall endeavor to chip in during the intermission of other essays. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAY. I also desire the privilege of being heard on the contested-election case.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] also desires the same privilege.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I suppose all the members of the Senate have heard the story told by JOHN ALLEN of the fellow who ran so fast to get out of a rainstorm that he fell and tumbled over and somebody said, "Why do you run so?" Said he, "I was afraid that the rain would stop before I could get in." I thought at one time this morning from the interruptions, very kindly and proper, that this matter would be adjusted before I would have an opportunity to make my speech. [Laughter.] I should be very willing to yield at any time, however, if this subject could be withdrawn from the attention of the Senate and recommitted in any proper manner, so that some resolution might be reported and brought before the Senate to which all could agree.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PALMER. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. In aid of the public service, and in order to get these resolutions acted upon by the Senate and out of the way as quickly as possible, I give notice that I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, after the Senator from Illinois gets through with his speech, that the matter be recommitted to the committee of conference, which is practically the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. PALMER. That suggestion, while it will not interfere with my present purpose to address the Senate on the subject of these resolutions, affords me a very great deal of satisfaction.

Mr. President, I object to the propositions of the committee, first, for the reason that their whole tone is unfriendly toward the Government of Spain. There is, notwithstanding the very decorous language which is employed, underneath the whole a pervading spirit of unfriendliness toward the Spanish Government. Among the lessons left us in that wonderful legacy of the father of his country, his Farewell Address, the people of the United States are warned against unreasonable prejudices against any government or people, and they are also warned against unreasonable partialities for any. That underlying spirit of unreasonable prejudice and a spirit of semihostility pervades the whole of the structure of the resolutions before the Senate.

That this is true will appear very readily to any careful reader of the resolutions. I say nothing now of the declaration as to the state of war which is alleged to exist in Cuba; but I refer more particularly to the second resolution, which obtrudes upon the Spanish Government the opinion of Congress as to what ought to be the course of conduct on the part of Spain in respect to its Cuban population:

Resolved, That Congress deplores the destruction of life and property caused by the war now waging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest, equally in the interests of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations, would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba, it is the sense of Congress that the Government of the United States should use its good offices and friendly influence to that end.

The suggestion which is found in this resolution is, to say the least of it, intrusive. It volunteers an opinion to a foreign Government as to what should be its policy with respect to a portion of its subjects; it commits the American Congress to that view of the case, so far as these resolutions can be held to commit Congress or anybody else to anything.

I may remark, by the way, that one of my objections to these resolutions is that they propose to do that which it is conceded would be useless, if done, in legal, international, or political effect, and the practical fact remains that whatever is useless is mischievous. It can not be otherwise.

It suggests another fact, that the language that the American Congress proposes to employ, when addressed to a foreign government by the political department of the Government in diplomatic form, would be offensive and would probably lead to an interruption of diplomatic relations between the United States and Spain. If we could venture to interfere in this matter at all we ought to use guarded, careful language, such as could be employed in the most important diplomatic correspondence.

Again, referring to the tone and spirit of these resolutions, I refer to the third, which reads:

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European governments and their colonies on this continent.

That is a mere declaration of a fact which can of itself have no particular importance. Then it is said:

But from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba, in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples, the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention, if necessary.

Imagine that a note substantially like this resolution was addressed by an American diplomatic representative to the representatives of any foreign government. It would be regarded as offensive. What is it? "That the Government of the United States should be prepared" to intervene. Intervene in what respect? What is intervention? Intervention need not be war. The meaning is that the United States ought to be prepared to intervene for the protection of its interests. That is offensive and needlessly intrusive. The language is undiplomatic, such as must necessarily give offense, and it has given offense and is giving offense.

I recur again to the first proposition. This Government ought not to hesitate to employ language merely because it will give offense if the language is necessary. If the words ought to be spoken, then the words will be spoken; and if the words ought to be spoken, and are spoken, the Senate of the United States will be ready at any time, I have no doubt, to indorse the action of the Government. But these are needless words. Why throw out in advance this intimation of a purpose to intervene? Why say that to the world? Why say to Spain words which, if said to Spain by a representative of the United States, would be offensive and would probably lead to a necessity for intervention, and intervention by war?

These resolutions contain three distinct and unnecessarily associated propositions. The propositions are unnecessarily associated. What are they? The first resolution asserts that:

In the opinion of Congress a state of public war exists in Cuba.

Mr. President, where is the proof of that fact? I know that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in his emphatic, earnest way, said "If war does not exist in Cuba, where out of hell does it exist?" But the war in Cuba is much as I can imagine a war in hell would be. If the mere fact of slaughter and devastation, outrage and wrong, were war, such war as should be recognized by a civilized country, I grant the fact exists; but in the international relations of this Government with others we are not permitted to assume that mere murder, slaughter, violence, destruction of property, is war. In order to find the proper definition for the term "war" it must exist between two organized parties, two organized governments. I do not mean to say that either government need necessarily recognize the existence of the other; I do not mean to say that a government may not recognize a mere insurrection; but it must have attained such proportions and such means for preserving order that the people whose belligerency it is proposed to recognize have not only the form of a government, but must have some semblance of the power needed to maintain it.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] the other day in the course of a side discussion defined accurately, in my judgment, that insurrectionary condition which would justify a recognition of belligerency. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] remarked—I do not repeat his language—that in the beginning of our civil war there were proclamations issued threatening to treat some of the adherents of the Confederate government as pirates. The Senator from Alabama said, "Why did you not do it?" and then furnished his own answer, "Because you did not dare do it."

The point at which a people become belligerents and are entitled to a recognition of belligerency is the point at which they can exercise such measure of power as to protect themselves from outrage. In the case of our civil war, the Confederate government from the very beginning was an organized government. It had its armies, its judicial organization, it was an insurrection attempted in the name of the States; and the insurgents had the control of many of the States of the Union. They were a government; they were able to demand—and that demand was conceded by the Federal Government—that prisoners should be exchanged; that the ordinary rules of warfare should be observed, and when the Confederate government threatened to hang officers commanding negro troops, I might retort upon the Senator from Alabama and ask why did they not do it? and answer my own question by saying, "Simply because the National Government was able to protect them." They were able to resent the threat; and that constitutes, in my judgment, one of the tests, and perhaps the true test, of that condition to which an insurrection must reach in order to be recognized as belligerent.

I say that I have heard nothing yet which justifies the affirmation contained in the very forefront of these resolutions, that—

In the opinion of Congress a state of public war exists in Cuba, the parties to which are entitled to belligerent rights.

What was the exact condition of things in Cuba at the last advices? I answer the question myself, or I answer by asking another. Is there any proof anywhere, furnished to the Senate or to the country, that there exists in Cuba to-day an organized government—not regularly organized, but an organized government? Is there to-day in Cuba a government to which the United States can look for the redress of such wrongs as may be suffered by American citizens?

Suppose we concede the belligerency of the insurgents to-day. By doing so we abandon all claim upon Spain for indemnity for whatever outrages the insurgents may commit. From that time forth the United States undertakes to look to the insurgents alone for indemnity for wrongs and for the protection of the rights of American citizens. Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio, Does the proof exist anywhere that there is such a government in Cuba—I mean such an insurgent government—which has such force or organization as that the United States may look to that government for the protection of the interests of its citizens? Where is the seat of government? I know nothing about it. Its armies are fugitive, flying from place to place; it has no international relations; it has no treasury; it has no judicial organization, so far as I know. It is yet unorganized. I suppose the proposition is not denied that if the insurgents are recognized by the United States as belligerents it would follow that the United States would concede that Spain would not be liable for outrages suffered at their hands by Americans and for American property; that it would concede that Spain is no longer to be held liable, and that the insurgent government is the one to which alone the United States must look for the protection of its people or the indemnity for their wrongs.

It can not be said, then, with truth, that there exists in Cuba to-day an insurgent government to the care of which the people of the United States can remit the protection of the rights of the people of the United States who are resident in Cuba or who may otherwise fall within the power of the insurgent government.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question upon that issue of fact if he will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PALMER. With great pleasure.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator enumerates several very important functions of government which he says the insurgents in Cuba do not possess. He omitted to mention one other, and that I desire to ask him about. Does that insurgent government, or whatever you may call it, in Cuba levy and collect taxes in the ordinary way, or does it get its revenue by confiscation and by pillage?

Mr. PALMER. I am obliged to the Senator for his inquiry. The insurgent government is so completely unorganized that it has no treasury, no revenue, and no means whatever to afford pecuniary indemnity for wrongs done to others, nor has it the physical power to protect them.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PALMER. With pleasure.

Mr. CALL. I shall be very glad if the Senator will state any kind of evidence upon which he bases his statement. My information is entirely to the contrary. They do levy taxes; they have a treasury; they have civil officers, and they are a regularly organized government.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. A paper was sent here by T. Estrada Palma, who claims to be the agent of the Republic of Cuba, to Hon. Richard Olney, Secretary of State of the United States of America, who has communicated that to Congress, first to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It has been printed, and contains a full statement of the constitution and organization of the Government of the Republic of Cuba, giving its personnel, all the provisions of law in reference to it, and several general acts passed by that Government, which have been heretofore placed in the RECORD. I suppose, however, the Senator from Illinois has not observed it.

Then I hold here a letter written by Mr. Cisneros, the President of the Republic of Cuba, addressed to the people of the United States, in which he sets forth what he is doing there in the way of civil government, and also presents a very earnest appeal to the people of the United States to grant belligerent rights to the Republic of Cuba. Those papers were sent by a correspondent of the Star, and I communicated with Mr. Crosby Noyes, whom we all know—the Senator knows him perfectly well—long a resident of this city, a man of great capacity and ability and high character. I asked him whether or not those papers and the letter of Mr. Cisneros to the people of the United States were genuine, and he says as follows:

DEAR SIR: The authenticity of the Cisneros manifesto furnished to the Star by Captain Mannix is unquestionable. Had there been any manner of doubt about its authenticity it would never have appeared in the Star. All the internal evidence and all we know of our correspondent's undoubted facilities for communication with the insurgents confirm this and other important information concerning the doings and sayings of the Cuban leaders.

I would furnish these papers to the Senator from Illinois so that he could know exactly the situation there, but they were furnished to the Senate some time ago.

Mr. PALMER. To the extent that those papers are contained in the most admirable speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] I may say that I am familiar with them. I have read his speech with a great deal of interest and with the most earnest desire to concur with him not only in his argument, but in his conclusions; and if I were not standing here as one of the representatives of 4,000,000 people, whose interests to this extent and in this day are in my keeping and to whom I am responsible, I would concur in much that has been said by the Senator from Alabama. In the beginning of this matter, when the subject of the Cuban revolution was presented to me, I sympathized with them. But I remember to-day that standing here I have no right to indulge in other sympathies than such as I may commit the people of the State of Illinois to maintain.

Mr. MORGAN. Would it suit the convenience of the Senator if I should send Cuba's appeal to the desk and have it read?

Mr. PALMER. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Secretary to commence with the second column.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

REPUBLIC OF CUBA, EXECUTIVE HEADQUARTERS,
Cubitas Mountain, February 1.

To the American People:

The infant and struggling Republic of Cuba appeals to the grand and powerful Union of American States.

Undoubtedly this action is most unusual in the history of nations, but because of the international standing of the Cuban Republic—more correctly because it has no recognized place among the powers of the world—are we thus compelled to appeal informally and through the medium of the press directly to the people.

Indeed, it is that international standing that we are now seeking; that we now ask the American nation to give us, and that we pray it will see fit to grant in the name of liberty and of justice.

Why do we ask the American people alone to hear us, and why do we not address this document to the entire world? The answer is well known. We call to the people who have themselves suffered oppression and felt the iron heel of the tyrant. We call to the nation of heroes who threw off the slavish yoke, and who signaled to the downtrodden of the earth that the beacon light of liberty in America would never grow dim, but would throw its rays across the oceans to strugglers for freedom in other lands. We call to the nation that has ever greeted with open arms the honest exiles from far and near; the nation that gave hope to Poland and succor to Ireland; the nation that drove monarchy from Mexico and Hawaii, and so nobly and faithfully shielded our southern sister, Venezuela.

To whom would we appeal if not to America? To what land if not to that of Washington, of Jefferson, of Monroe, of Jackson, of Grant, of Blaine, of Cleveland, and the immortal Lincoln?

CUBA'S SECOND STRUGGLE.

The present is Cuba's second struggle for liberty. From 1868 to 1878—ten long, suffering years—a little band of patriots fought gallantly on. While the wrongs then were as great as they now are, the Cuban people did not rise as they have risen in this war to throw off the Spanish yoke. The thirst for liberty which permeates the island to-day was unknown then, except to a small minority of the people, and after ten years of warfare the end came; but it did not bring success.

But even then Spain made promises to the Cuban people that she did not propose to fulfill, and from that time the island has suffered as no other section of the earth has in the same period. Spain claims she holds Cuba by divine right. Such were her pretensions with regard to all her American possessions; but a Divine hand liberated those same possessions, and to-day they are free and independent Republics of the New World.

SPANISH MISREPRESENTATION.

The Spaniards have raised the cry abroad that the Cuban rebellion is merely an uprising of negroes. There is no truth in this as stated. It is not a negro uprising nor a white uprising, but a rebellion of the people of Cuba against a cruel and unrelenting despot. But even if it were a negro rebellion, would the people of the United States frown upon it?

The answer to that question is told by the firing upon Fort Sumter, the war of 1861 to 1865, the million of graves in the southland and the God-inspired proclamation of Abraham Lincoln. Was not the freedom of the black man announced in that undying language used by the martyr President? And did not the blood of a million American freemen stain grassy mounds in the now loyal and patriotic South, writing in eternal words the emancipation of the black man?

The world knows the noble yet fearful history. Spain knows it, and when her representative in the capital of the United States says the Cuban rebellion is a negro movement entirely he not only falsifies, but he insults the memory of the grand army of the dead.

We are proud to have our colored brothers with us in this glorious struggle for freedom; for Cuba, when free, will be like the land of Washington, where every man worthy of citizenship will be accorded the full rights of civil and religious liberty.

THE RIGHTS OF BELLIGERENCY.

We ask the American people to grant us, through their President and Congress, those rights of belligerency to which, according to the laws of war and of nations, we are are entitled. Our armies have marched whither they might throughout the entire island, and for weeks have threatened the stronghold of Spain's power in Cuba.

Must we capture Habana and drive Spain's hirelings across the sea before we are even given the right as men to fight for that priceless gift which God destined should be universally divided among his children? Must we gain our independence before we are accorded the sanction of the world to labor for it?

THE REPUBLIC ESTABLISHED.

The Cuban republican government of the island is a firmly established institution. Covering considerably over one-half of the area is the civil branch of our authority, with regularly appointed governors of different sections, prefectos in subdivisions, etc. Of course, Spanish formalities are still followed to a great extent in the administration of the local governments, for a complete change of method in a few months would be too radical.

Here in Cubitas are the head officers and chief departments of the Republic. Here we are able and most willing to receive representatives of the United States or other nations.

On all grounds of diplomatic and international usage the Cuban Republic is entitled not alone to recognition of belligerent rights for its armies now in the field, but to actual independence. Still we do not ask that the latter be accorded us at present. All we wish now is to be looked upon by the Government of the United States as men and soldiers battling for their birthright. We do not wish to appear in the eyes of the world like bandits and rabble.

Is Spain entitled to consideration at the hands of a modern, civilized, and highly progressive nation? Does her misrule of Cuba for a century commend her to the hearts and minds of men? Are her hirelings here to lift up and educate the Cuban and make his beloved island prosperous? Under the accursed flag of Castile will not freedom's muffled shrieks still be heard on the American Hemisphere? Will not the continuance of her supremacy in Cuba mean the perpetuation of mediæval institutions, the downtrodding of right and equity and the upholding of all that to men of the nineteenth century is debased and barbaric?

People of the free and glorious United States, Cuba appeals to you! She asks that you raise your voice in her behalf. She asks that you announce to the world that at least as against the tyrant she be given an equal chance. Cuba, the bleeding, appeals to her American sisters. She does it in the name of God, of justice, of civilization, and of America.

SALVADOR CISNEROS-BETANCOURT.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow me to say that although I have been raised from my childhood in a Southern community, among slaves and slaveholders, I applaud and approve every word in that splendid appeal of Cisneros to the American people.

Mr. PALMER. In 1870, an organization existed in this country to free Cuba. One of its leaders was that distinguished Kentuckian who has done so much in opposition to slavery, Cassius M. Clay. He invited me to become a member of the Cuban organization, very much to my surprise. I answered him by saying that I understood it was an insurrection of men who claimed freedom for themselves, but who asserted the right to enslave others. I declined for that reason to be a party to that movement. That insurrection had none of the elements of universal liberty in its comprehension. It was an insurrection against the authority of Spain, but it was proposed at the same time to continue the existence of slavery in Cuba. I think slavery was ultimately abolished by the action of the Spanish Government—I am quite sure that I am correct in that respect—so that the appeal made here does not address me with the force that it would otherwise have.

I have said already that if I were acting in a mere personal capacity; if I were not under the most solemn responsibilities to others, not only to the people of the State of Illinois, but to the people of the United States; if I could in their name say that war exists in Cuba, and that the people of the United States ought to take upon themselves the responsibility of maintaing that declaration, I might listen to the appeal of the Cuban nominal government, because, after all that is said, that government is purely a nominal one. It has no fixed jurisdiction over a single township in Cuba. It is a fugitive government. It is supported by a force that is constantly moving; a force that rarely resists the organized forces of Spain. It is not a government, nor is the governmental organization one as to which I ought to say to the people of this country, "You can afford, in view of your own interests and in the interest of the people of the United States," which alone I am to consult, "to intrust the protection of the rights and interests of the people of the United States."

I do not now go into any analysis of the rules of international law that define or indicate the condition when belligerency may be recognized in an insurrectionary people; but the simple crucial point with me is whether there is such an insurgent government in Cuba as can be trusted with the defense and the protection of the rights of the American people whose rights are involved in that controversy. My answer is no. The Government may have a name, but it is without local habitation. In this matter I disavow any question of sympathy for Cubans or others. My argument is predicated upon the ground that it is not to the interest of the people of the United States that they should interfere in this question in any manner whatever, and especially in the matter of recognizing the belligerency of this fugitive government—a government which can offer no protection; a government which has no treasury, no revenue, no habitation; a government that can not be intrusted, can not be responsible to the people of the United States for the protection of the rights of our people. So much on that point.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] said to me a few moments ago that proofs should be furnished that there was no insurgent government in Cuba, or that the evidence before the Senate required some answer. I answer otherwise. The recognition that those people demand, if it were in the power of the Senate to concede it to them, is one that must depend upon facts to be furnished by themselves.

Now, Mr. President, the second resolution is to my mind equally objectionable. I refer again to the same unfriendly spirit that pervades all these resolutions. The second resolution, after deploring the loss of life and property caused by the war in Cuba, announces the belief on the part of the Congress of the United States that a solution of the struggle will be found in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba.

The people of Cuba, like all other people, can have liberty if they can win it. I recollect that portion of the Declaration of Independence read by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] a few days ago with such earnestness. I recognize the right of a people to throw off a government which they believe to be oppressive. I recognize the right of a people to abolish and alter existing governments at their pleasure. I do not enter into a discussion of the questions so clearly presented by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as to who that people should be. I concede that right, but it is one which belongs to the people themselves. If they can alter their own government, I concede their right to do so; but I deny the right of the Congress of the United States to obtrude upon Spain its advice or to suggest to it what should be the policy of that Government to any portion of the Spanish people. If I were speaking in other than a representative character I should give my cordial and earnest sympathies to those struggling people. I am influenced solely by the interests of the people of the United States.

The whole of the present session, it seems to me, has abounded in these semiassertions of a right to interfere, either by advice or otherwise, with the conditions that exist in other countries. I insist that the great law which ought to control governments is that which ought to control the conduct of individuals: Mind your own business; attend to your own affairs; consult, look out and see what your rights are; compel others to respect your rights, but do not attempt to assert those rights to an extent that can not be recognized by the feeblest nation.

The last resolution is equally objectionable, because it contemplates war. It is a useless menace to the Spanish Government:

That Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens by intervention, if necessary.

We commence in these resolutions by recognizing the belligerency of the insurgents. We withdraw very largely the legitimate interests of the United States from the protection of the Spanish Government. When we propose to intervene in this war it means, judging from the whole tone of the resolution, war with Spain to protect our interests. It does not mean war with the insurgents to protect our interests. It means war with Spain. It is like the idle menace of quarrelsome, turbulent men, "If you invade my rights, I will defend them; if you approach me or if you strike me, I will shoot you," one of the very methods by which blows are invited. This would be an assertion, in advance of any wrong, that we would defend our rights by intervention, by war. Who doubts that the American people will defend their rights by intervention or by war? Why connect this assertion with this particular controversy? Why say it now? Why urge it now, in the heated debates of the Senate? It is something of a reflection, something of a reproach to the American Senate, when it is said that the Government ought to prepare for intervention to protect American rights. How prepare? Ought we to build ships? Ought we to raise armies? Ought we in some way to increase the revenue? Ought we to prepare any of the physical agencies of preparation? Or is it a mere intimation that if our rights are invaded, are infringed, we are already prepared not only in the means but we have the will to intervene and protect our rights.

It is an idle menace, in my judgment utterly unworthy of the American Congress—I say unworthy; I use that term in its most moderate sense. Who dares assert that the American Congress will not sustain the Government in the defense of its rights if invaded by any Government or anywhere? It is a menace which has no meaning, or if it has any meaning at all it is the meaning that indicates the purpose to be offensive. It is a declaration in advance, and taken in connection with this series of resolutions it means no more than this: The American Government sympathizes with the insurgents, it will employ its power in defense of its rights, and it will intervene if those rights are invaded, as if such a declaration was needed. The American Republic has existed now for more than one hundred years, and has never submitted to an outrage except under extremely distressing circumstances. I remember that I once submitted, with what composure I could command, in a memorable incident with respect to certain Confederate commissioners. But we have been eager and ready at all times to maintain our rights. This declaration will be regarded and is intended—not intended except in the sense that every person must be presumed to intend to use language in its ordinary sense—as an act of hostility to Spain.

Mr. President, I have not intended to go into the matter at any great length. I have very nearly concluded the remarks which I purposed to address to the Senate, and I will conclude by a general statement of the condition of this question as it appears to me.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] a few days ago demonstrated as far as demonstration is possible that the American Senate has nothing whatever to do with this subject. We can make no law; we can lay down no rule that any other department of the Government is bound to respect—I say nothing of being bound to obey. We are, in this instance, in the exercise of no power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States. It seems to me that in these resolutions, like those in regard to Armenia and others to which I might refer, we cheapen the influence and power of the Senate. It was said by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] the other day that the voice of the American Senate will be influential. That is true beyond question. In this instance it will be influential for mischief, without in the slightest degree being potent for good.

What is the law of our relations with Spain growing out of the condition in Cuba? Suppose the resolutions are passed, will not the law of to-day be the law of to-morrow? We change no law by our action. We neither commit the President nor any other department of the Government to our declarations or opinions. We simply express a feeling, and not the most amiable and gentle feeling, toward Spain; but we express an intrusive temper; we express a disposition to sympathize with one of the struggling parties in this great controversy. When we have done that what have we accomplished? Can I speak for the people of Illinois in regard to their sympathies on this subject? I can guess what their sentiments are, but they have not confided to me any duty with respect to this subject, and while my conduct and even these remarks may be the subject of criticism and complaint, or of approbation, yet I can not bind them. My expression of their sympathy may or may not be correct. It is no part of my duty to speak for them. They are free men and will speak for themselves and they will act for themselves.

The conditions in Cuba after the passage of these resolutions will be the same, and the relations of the United States to Cuba or to Spain will be the same in law and in fact. But like all unnecessary acts, which means that all unnecessary acts are mischievous, we presume without the power to make a law or lay down any rules of conduct we profess to give expression to American sentiments. The Senate can not recognize the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents. The Senate can not change the existing relations. I repeat what I have said so often, it can not change the legal or international relations which now exist between Spain and its insurgent subjects.

But we can do mischief by language like this. We may declare that a state of war exists in Cuba. The answer is, it is not war, it is a mere insurrection. The Cubans have not organized a government except on paper. Their government has not the vitalizing value which is given to a government supported by force. We know that there must be a latent force, an underlying force that gives to government its sanction or its power to vindicate itself. In order to recognition of belligerency there must be a government which can be held responsible to other governments. I see no evidence that the government there can take care of itself. I see no evidence that that government can protect the rights of the American people. I see nothing there but an earnest struggle—it may be a patriotic—but an earnest struggle on the part of a feeble party against a powerful, organized government. It may have my prayers individually, and their gallantry may claim my praises, but I stand here as a representative of the American people, who must indorse my act if I should be guilty of a folly. If it shall involves us in a war I know who will die in our battles. I know whose property will be taken.

I know that the soldiers will be American soldiers. They will die on battlefields in defense of the flag, and in a just cause they ought to die; it will be their glory to die in defense of the flag in a just cause, and that just cause is the cause which the American people decide to be just. But I can not consent to use language which may involve us in international troubles and complications which I know must cost the American people immensely, and they must be responsible for it if evil results; while if we do nothing, which is the wise thing when you do not know what to do, we let our people, so far as they are permitted by our laws, follow their own inclinations in regard to rendering assistance to the Cuban insurgents. Let each man for himself do what he thinks is right, obeying the laws, but let us not make such a declaration here, when we are in the attitude of a mere popular assembly, where we have no power to bind anybody, where we can not change the relations between this Government and Cuba, except that indirectly we may by our intemperance involve the country in war by arousing the passions of the Spanish nation or of other nations. It is always wise, when you do not know what to do, to do nothing.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. MILLS. I ask my friend from Mississippi to yield to me for a moment. I desire to introduce a joint resolution, and I ask that it be read at length.

The joint resolution (S. R. 109) directing the President of the United States to request the Government of Spain to grant to the people of Cuba the power of local self-government, and in case the Government of Spain shall refuse, to take possession of the Island of Cuba and hold it until its inhabitants can institute such government as they may wish, and organize and arm such forces as may be necessary to support it, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the President of the United States is hereby directed to request the Government of Spain to authorize the people of Cuba, subject to the sovereignty of Spain, to institute such local government as they may wish, and invest it with such powers as they may think necessary to secure to the people of Cuba the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

SEC. 2. In case Spain shall refuse to grant to the inhabitants of Cuba the rightful power of local self-government, then the President of the United States is hereby directed to take possession of the Island of Cuba with the military and naval forces of the United States and hold the same until the people of Cuba can organize a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, and arm and equip such military force as may be necessary to protect them from invasion.

Mr. MILLS. I give notice that I shall submit some remarks to-morrow morning, after the routine business of the Senate is through, in support of such a measure as is outlined in the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas ask that the joint resolution lie on the table for the present?

Mr. MILLS. I ask that it lie on the table and be printed. I shall call it up to-morrow morning for the purpose I have stated.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me to do so——

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to cut off the Senator from Mississippi, but I wish, in compliance with the notice I gave, to have formal action on the conference report.

Mr. CULLOM. I understood that the Senator from Mississippi desires to say only a few words.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. After the Senator from Mississippi is through, I shall endeavor to get action on the conference report.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I was one of the six members of this body who voted against the resolutions which were sent to the other House and which came back here in the shape of a conference report submitted by the conferees on the part of the two Houses. I had no opportunity during the debate on those resolutions to state the reasons why I so voted. I propose to do so now, without argument.

There are several reasons why I opposed the resolutions. It is necessary for me to state only one. In order to be brief and in order to state my position exactly, I have reduced that position to writing.

However much I may sympathize with a people struggling for liberty and for independence, I sympathize more with the sentiment of the necessity of preserving our Constitution and our own free institutions. In my judgment, the subject-matter of the resolutions belongs to the executive and not to the legislative department of the Government. I believe there is no exigency whatever, certainly none which relates alone to the welfare of a foreign people, which can justify or even palliate an assumption by one department of the Government of powers and duties which, by the Constitution, have been assigned to another and different power.

Mr. SHERMAN. In pursuance of the notice I gave a while ago, and with an earnest desire to promote the public business, so that we may proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bills and the other measures that will naturally crowd upon us, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk. It is based upon the idea that if adopted and the report of the committee of conference should be again delayed in any form in which it is presented, there will be no factious opposition to it, but after a reasonable debate the subject may be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate in regard to the insurrection in Cuba, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Ohio that the conference report should be first disagreed to before the resolution is considered.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let the formal motion be put on concurring in the conference report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; let the motion be first put. The conference report should be disagreed to.

The report was not concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to agree to the resolution. If it is only to open up further debate, I prefer to withdraw it.

Mr. ALLEN. I am unable to hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have offered the resolution with the understanding that there would be no further debate upon the question until the committee of conference again reports upon the subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no desire to debate the question to any unnecessary length.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will allow the resolution to pass, as it was the understanding on both sides.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. The understanding was that the resolution should be adopted without debate. When the report is again made the Senator will have an opportunity to speak. I appeal to the Senator to allow the resolution to be adopted.

Mr. ALLEN. I am entirely in the dark as to what the Senator from Ohio wants. I can not hear a word that he says.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I can explain the situation to the Senator from Nebraska in a word. The Senator from Ohio has offered a proposition which results in a recommittal of the Cuban resolutions to the conference committee, and, as he states, the subject will be open for discussion when the report of the conference is again made.

Mr. ALLEN. Why not discuss it now?

Mr. SHERMAN. This course is pursued with the understanding that there will be no factious opposition to the report when made, and that after reasonable debate it shall be acted on.

Mr. ALLEN. Why should it not be discussed now?

Mr. CULLOM. No one now knows what the conference committee may report. It may bring in an entirely new resolution. It will be more apropos, it seems to me, to discuss the report when it comes back. Besides, I am anxious to bring up an appropriation bill for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. We have already disagreed to the conference report.

Mr. CULLOM. The conference report has been disagreed to by the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that, and the pending question is a motion to refer the subject back to the conference committee, and it is properly debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. That the Senate shall insist in its disagreement and ask for a further conference.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Nebraska will allow me, I will state that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] took the floor and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] had the floor to further discuss the matter and the debate would have gone on, but the Senator from Ohio, who had charge of the resolutions, to avoid further debate and in order that other business might be proceeded with, made a suggestion which was generally agreed to, and which now is embodied in the pending resolution, to send the whole matter back to the conference committee. The whole object of this course was to prevent further debate now and proceed to other business of the Senate. The Senator from Texas, who had the floor, gave way, and it was, I think, the understanding that this course should be pursued. It seems that the Senator from Nebraska did not know about it. The object was to prevent further debate now. Whenever the matter comes up again it will of course be open for debate.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not see anything in the remarks of the Senator from Maine to deprive Senators of the proper discussion of this question. I have no desire to discuss it at any length whatever. There are two or three points which were brought out in the discussion last week to which I desire to reply. I will do that as hastily as possible and as concisely as I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the regular order. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Maine that the regular order be temporarily laid aside in order that the Cuban resolutions may be further considered? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and within a few moments the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], have each announced a constitutional doctrine which I do not believe can be sustained, and which ought not to be announced in the Senate without contradiction on the part of some one. That doctrine is that under our form of government, as those Senators assert, the sole power of recognizing the belligerency or the political independence of a foreign nation resides in the Chief Executive. That is not only a doctrine which can not be sustained, but it is a constitutional heresy that ought not to pass without refutation from some quarter.

There is not one word in the Constitution of the United States conferring, either expressly or by the broadest kind of implication, power upon the President of the United States to recognize either the belligerency of a foreign country or its political independence; and certainly there is nothing in the theory of the Constitution nor in the theory of our Government or the history of the time when the Constitution was framed and adopted by the people of the United States which can in any manner lend color to that conclusion.

Both the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] announced also that the Supreme Court of the United States had frequently laid down doctrines that are binding upon us, holding certain facts and certain circumstances that came before it in litigation as evidence conclusive of a state of belligerency or state of independence.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Nebraska seems to be laying the foundation of his argument, and before he proceeds I should like to ask him a question. I understood him to say that there is nothing in the Constitution which by any inference would confer upon the President the power of recognizing either the belligerency or the independence of a foreign state. Is not the recognition of the independence of a foreign state involved in the power of the President to appoint ambassadors?

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to that point and to know whether it is quite clear as he seems to make it.

Mr. ALLEN. I was coming to that proposition. I propose to call the attention of the Senate to the constitutional proposition on this subject before I conclude, which will be within a few moments. The power to recognize the belligerent rights of a foreign nation and the power to recognize the complete political independence of a foreign nation is a joint power, possessed by Congress and by the executive department jointly. Before, however, proceeding upon that line I desire to return to the point I left off when interrupted by the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator from California and the Senator from Louisiana seem to think that the Supreme Court has some kind of power that is binding upon the Senate, a power to announce a rule which we are compelled to follow. Mr. President, that can not be true. This Government of ours, according to the doctrines announced by Chief Justice Marshall and by the illustrious fathers, is a Government composed of three coordinate departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments. I think I name them in the order in which they occur in the Constitution. Unfortunately, however, in these latter days there are some instances, and many of them, where the Supreme Court seems to be supreme and to exercise the authority to annul the acts of the other departments of the Government. But the Supreme Court, according to the established rules of jurisprudence that are older than this country itself, has no power to recognize the belligerency or the independence of a foreign nation until that belligerency or independence has been recognized and established by the political department of the Government. There has never been a time in the history of English jurisprudence or a time in the history of Roman jurisprudence when the power to recognize the belligerency of a foreign nation or the independence of a foreign nation was not committed by practice to the political department of the Government. Certainly it can not be successfully urged that the Supreme Court possesses the slightest political power except that portion which it may from time to time use incidentally in the adjudication of cases.

Suppose, to illustrate my position, that some citizen should feel himself aggrieved by the conduct of Richard Olney, Secretary of State, and should bring an action against Mr. Olney. It would be a perfect plea and a perfect defense for Mr. Olney to set up that what he did he did as the agent of the political department of this country, and that it involved the administration of the political affairs of the nation, which would deprive by that means the Supreme Court or any other court of jurisdiction to inquire further into the subject-matter of litigation. Yet we are told in the Senate gravely, by grave Senators, too, that the sole power to recognize the belligerency or independence of Cuba rests with the President of the United States; that Congress, as a coordinate department of the Government, as the chief repository of the political power of the nation, is powerless and impotent to intervene and check the President or control his conduct, and that conclusion seems to be reached by Senators from some language they find in the Constitution.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow interruptions or does he prefer not to be interrupted?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly; I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to ask him this question: Suppose that an independent government should be established, as the President thought, in Cuba, and the President thereupon should issue a proclamation recognizing the independence of Cuba; does not the Senator think that that would be effective without any action by Congress?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think it would be. I do not see how it could be.

Mr. PLATT. That goes right to the point.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire for a moment to refer to the Constitution. Section 3, Article II, of the Constitution, referring to the duties of the President, reads as follows:

SEC. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may, adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

Another provision of the Constitution confers upon the President of the United States the power to "appoint ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls," but it confers it in language which leaves it apparent, beyond all controversy and all dispute, that the Senate of the United States, as the highest representative of the political power of this Government, must concur in his action, or advise and consent, to use the language of the Constitution, before it shall be effectual. The very fact that the framers of our Constitution put this check upon the executive department of the Government shows conclusively that it was the purpose of the people in the formation of the Federal Constitution to retain this power in their own hands. The language employed indicates that; the spirit breathed by the instrument itself indicates it; and the whole framework and policy of our Constitution, as well as the spirit of the people at the time it was adopted and became the paramount law of the land, indicates that purpose. Yet, Mr. President, without one word that can be found in the Constitution itself, without one fact being cited as existing concurrently with the formation of the Constitution, the people are gravely informed here by at least three Senators upon this side of the Chamber that this high prerogative and kingly power rests in the President of the United States alone; that he, at any time he may see fit, by his mere caprice—for there is no power upon our part to check him if the position of these Senators be correct—may recognize the belligerence or independence of a nation, and we be powerless to advise and consent to it or have anything whatever to do with the recognition.

I did not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of discussing this question consecutively and thoroughly, as I should like to do if the time were at my disposal, but I wanted to enter my dissent from a proposition that is so absolutely at variance with our Constitution as that announced by the Senators to whom I refer. Let me say that this goes out to the country as the grave opinion of those Senators, and is taken up by the people, some of whom do not devote so much attention to these questions as they ought to, and it is gravely asserted by them that that is a true interpretation of the Constitution because it is from the distinguished Senators from Delaware, Mississippi, and Louisiana; and it ought not to go undisputed in this Chamber.

One proposition more, and I think I shall conclude my remarks. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] in discussing this question a few days ago said we have no evidence that war exists in Cuba. If I understand the Senator from Louisiana rightly, it would be necessary, in his judgment, to bring the witnesses before the bar of the Senate and prove by ocular demonstration that a state of war exists in Cuba.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Nebraska must have very widely misinterpreted what I said on that point. I did not say that there was not war in Cuba, but I did say that from the evidence before the Senate and the country there was not public war in that sense which would authorize a country at peace with a power where an insurrection existed to recognize, under international law, the war being carried on in Cuba as public war. Nor, if the Senator will pardon me, did he understand me to say, nor can it be implied from any remarks I made, that I contended that there must be witnesses present before the Senate in order to establish a case of public war. I think I said that the Executive had the means to gather the necessary evidence to establish a state of public war through communication with our consuls resident in Cuba or through any other authentic official source.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that the Senator's explanation needs explaining. There may be some shadowy distinction existing between a state of public and a state of private war—I suppose that is the antithesis of public war—but that I do not understand. Certainly a state of war exists on the Island of Cuba. What is war? Mr. President, it is simply an armed conflict between nations or between parts of nations. It must be something that rises above a riot; it must be a rebellion; and, so far as Cuba is concerned, it is a rebellion, with a regular military organization upon the part of the insurgents. If that is not a state of public war in fact, then I am entirely mistaken in my conception of what constitutes public war.

But how are we to prove it? The Senator says that we could not understand that it was his purpose to have the witnesses brought here and interrogated, but the Senator from Louisiana stood here and said there was no evidence before the country or before the Senate of the existence of a state of public war—I will put in the word "public"—on the Island of Cuba. How do we know that there was a state of war on that island from 1868 to 1878? We know it simply as a matter of history. Do we know that George Washington was the first President of the United States? Nobody living has ever seen him.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator says we know there was a state of public war. I think that was the assertion he made——

Mr. ALLEN. I will put it "public" or "private" war.

Mr. CAFFERY. That in Cuba from 1868 to 1878 there was ten years of public war. Does not the Senator know that the war then carried on in Cuba was not characterized by President Grant as a public war, in an international sense, between those dates?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know anything about what President Grant thought about it or believed about it; and I am not concerned in the inquiry at this time. I do not believe in fighting battles according to a book. I never did believe in it, and I never shall believe in it. But what I wanted to prove on the point to which I desired to direct the attention of the Senate when interrupted by the Senator from Louisiana is this: We are to shut our eyes and our ears to current history of the tragic events that are taking place on the Island of Cuba.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. It is with reference to this matter of public war. I understand—if the Senator will allow me to preface the question with a single sentence, so that the question may be understood——

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that where a state of public war exists there is some territory all of whose inhabitants, whatever may be their personal conduct or disposition, are at war with the inhabitants of some other territory. For instance, the most loyal man in South Carolina during our late civil war was held to be at war with the most disloyal man in Massachusetts, and if they made contracts they were subject under the law of nations as contracts with belligerent enemies. Now, will the Senator tell us what district or territory in the Island of Cuba is so at war with any other district or territory of the Island of Cuba that the character of belligerence is imputed to one as against the other?

Mr. ALLEN. I think I can tell the Senator probably about as much as he and I both know about that matter, which is to be drawn from current newspaper reports, and possibly some slight evidence in the consular reports. My understanding is that about two-thirds of the Island of Cuba, possibly three-fourths, is under the dominion of the insurgents under the command of Gomez and Maceo and their followers. There is a distinct portion of that territory that has on its face as well-equipped armies as could be expected under the circumstances, where the Republic of Cuba has absolute control and dominion over life and property. That is a portion of the territory through which the Spanish forces do not march, and over which they do not exercise any control. There are there well-equipped and drilled armies in the field under martial law. I have the number of troops here, to which I am going to refer in a moment. If that does not constitute a state of war according to the definition of the books—if war is to be fought according to books—then I am mistaken in my understanding of what the books define to be necessary to constitute war.

Mr. President, I do not know, and I am not concerned in knowing, what President Grant said about the Cuban war from 1868 to 1878. I know, President Grant knew, you know, and the world knows that we have power to recognize the political independence or belligerency, or it may be both, of any people who are engaged in war with one another. That war does not necessarily require the existence of a certain number of men under arms. It is simply required that one portion of the people shall be arrayed in armed hostility against the other, with an army under its control, and a government set up over a specific portion of the territory which is under contention. Whenever we see fit to say that that contending force is a belligerent force, or whenever we see fit to say that that territory and the people occupying it constitute an independent government, a political entity, it becomes so in the eyes of the world, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to call attention to a statement of the laws of war contained in lectures delivered at the Naval War College by Freeman Snow, Ph. D., LL. B., late instructor in international law in Harvard University. This book was sent me by Captain Taylor, president of the Naval War College, whom I conceive to be one of our most eminent men in the Navy, both as a scientist and as a lawyer. Professor Snow gives this definition:

Wheaton's definition of a public war is a contest by force between independent sovereign States. If it is declared in form or duly commenced, it entitles both the belligerent parties to all the rights of war against each other. Whatever is permitted by the laws of war to one of the belligerent parties is equally permitted to the other.

A mixed war is a war between members of the same political society. It is a civil war, though it may not reach beyond the proportions of an insurrection or a local rebellion. The movements in Spain in 1866 and 1867 were of this nature. Such a war may attain sufficient strength and magnitude to entitle both contending parties to all the rights of war with respect to each other and to neutral States. Again, according to the manner and degree of the hostile operations, wars are said to be perfect or imperfect.

I need not go into that further. I think that is the best definition I have seen on the subject by anybody.

Mr. ALLEN. That is in substance the definition given by Mr. Davis in his recent work on International Law of the laws of war.

I do not think that we are required to have any more evidence before us than has been furnished us by the Department of State and has been furnished us by the press of the country. It is true that possibly we must discount a certain portion of the reports which come from the scene of action; but he would be a bold man who would stand in the Senate to-day and say that a state of war does not exist in Cuba. Are we to stand here until the Spaniards cut the throats of the Cubans, and until the bloody events pass into the permanent history of the country before we take any notice of what is transpiring there? We know that a state of war exists there; and the only question, in my judgment, is whether we have the patriotism to say that those people in Cuba who are struggling for their liberty shall be recognized as belligerents and have equal opportunities with the people of Spain in this country and in the ports of this country.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to again interrupt him a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Some dispute is made about the facts and the extent of civil government in Cuba. The correspondent of the Evening Star, of this city, whose veracity and character are vouched for by Mr. Crosby S. Noyes, in the letter I read here this morning, giving an account of his second visit to Cubitas, the capital of the Republic, speaking of Colonel Menocal, who is a near relative of a very distinguished engineer in the United States, and is evidently a man of very fine character, who was educated at Cornell University—speaking to Colonel Menocal, chief of staff of President Cisneros, the correspondent asked a question about what sort of a tour they had been on. He and General Cisneros and 400 men who were his guard had been on a tour of inspection. An inquiry was made in regard to that tour. Colonel Menocal said:

This has been a sort of inspection tour. There was the appointment of about thirty prefectos to be made, and there were a number of others who had not sent in reports for two months. President Cisneros desired to make a personal investigation, and so two weeks ago we left Cubitas. Since that time we have been over in the extreme eastern end of the Republic, made an inspection of the force in the Sierra Maestra Mountains, looked over the stores, farms, and prison there, and on the way back made appointments of prefectos and subprefectos in a score of districts.

Colonel Menocal was reminded that he used the term "republic," referring to the island.

"Why isn't it a republic?" he asked. "We have our established and permanent seat of government, have over 350 prefectos in the island, and govern with civil laws at least two-thirds of the total area. Of course I understand that Spain still controls the seaboard and holds the cities, but her navy is her only salvation. There are hundreds of miles in the interior of Cuba that Spanish soldiers have never trod, and for that matter never shall.

THE REPUBLIC ESTABLISHED.

"If we could not justly lay claim to having a republic here established, how is it that our President, with an escort of only 400 men, can be away from Cubitas for a fortnight, traverse a distance of 300 miles by the main highway of the island, and never a shot be fired by friend or foe? How is it that we have civil officers all the way from Puerto Principe to the very shadow of the castle at Santiago de Cuba; and again, how is it that in the Sierra Maestra Mountains we have working upon the farms of the Republic over 700 Spanish soldiers who were made prisoners of war, and who, not caring to return to their ranks, are protected by Gen. José Maceo and his men? This latter feature may be news to the American people, but the Spanish Government knows it full well, and has made attempts to recapture its men, although at the same time it has denied such a state of affairs."

The sound of a bugle coming from up the road told Colonel Menocal and the other officers at the hotel, among them Dr. Orles, chief of the insurgent hospital corps, and who, by the way, does not speak a word of English, that the hour for taking up the march had arrived.

And they proceeded to Cubitas.

Mr. ALLEN. There can not be the slightest doubt that we must give some force to current history; we must recognize the existence of a state of war in Cuba. It is recognized in the press of foreign countries; it is in the mouth of every person who reads; witnesses come from Cuba and tell us the condition of affairs there; every person understands that there is a state of war; and yet Senators come into this Chamber and gravely say that there is no evidence of the existence of war there. The Senator from Louisiana said the other day that there was no evidence of the existence of any number of the belligerents under arms. I will call the attention of the Senate to the evidence of that fact later.

Mr. CAFFERY. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him what indicia he holds are necessary to exist before a nation can declare a condition of war waged between a parent country and insurrectionary forces to be a public war?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, there is no line of demarcation which is recognized among nations. It rests altogether within a nation itself.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then I would ask the Senator whether or not he rejects the conditions laid down by international writers as indicating a state of war?

Mr. ALLEN. No. The difficulty with the Senator from Louisiana is that I do not recognize his interpretation of international writers. The writers are all right, and the Senator from Louisiana is all right, but I do not conclude that necessarily there must be a synthetical relation between the writer and the reader.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator will permit me again. I ask him whether all international-law authors do not hold that it is necessary for the insurrectionary forces to hold and occupy a certain, well-defined extent of territory; that it is necessary for them to have a regular, organized government; that it is necessary for them to have a seat of government, and at least one seaport in a country which borders on the sea?

Mr. ALLEN. I am really glad the Senator calls my attention to the argument again—I heard him make it two or three days ago—that the insurgents must have at least one seaport. The history of the world is full of nations that never had a seaport.

Mr. CAFFERY. When I put that question, I said any country which bordered upon the sea.

Mr. MORGAN. Switzerland has none now.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Alabama says Switzerland has none.

Mr. MORGAN. And could not have one.

Mr. ALLEN. And it has been an independent nation I do not know how many hundred years.

Mr. CAFFERY. Where a nation does not border upon the sea, and where the nation recognized is not contiguous, do not the international-law writers say that a condition can hardly arise where the recognition of belligerency is necessary?

Mr. ALLEN. I am treating the question of recognizing belligerents. We have the right to recognize the belligerence of a people as a political power inherent in this nation. We have the sole power to say when and where this doctrine shall be applied; and we are not required to look into Wheaton's International Law, or the volume on international law written by Mr. Pomeroy, or the volume by any other author upon the face of the earth when we see fit to apply this doctrine. A Senator behind me says there is no such international law; but there was an author who wrote upon that subject, I think, long before the Senator and I were born. What I claim, and where I differ with the Senator from Louisiana, is that he wants the Cubans to be killed or to survive according to a literal definition contained in some volume he holds in his hands.

The conditions of people necessarily must differ. Here is a people who, as I have said, are in control of at least two-thirds of the territory of the Island of Cuba, with a civil government set up and a military government that is able to coop up this man Weyler and his forces in Habana and hold them in check; yet the honorable Senator from Louisiana gravely asserts here that because the conditions which exist in Cuba do not square with his definition or his understanding of the definition of belligerency as he finds it in some law book, therefore this great nation of 70,000,000 people is impotent and powerless to do it. The Senator can content himself with these things if he wants to. I do not want to.

Then the Senator says again that the insurgents must have a capital. They do have a capital. The Senator from Louisiana said a few days ago it was away off in the wilderness—off where Weyler and his forces could not get at it. I infer that the Senator from Louisiana would hold that that capital must be accessible to its enemies or it is not a capital. The Senator said the capitol building was constructed of bamboo, and probably with a roof composed of leaves and grass. I ask the distinguished Senator from Louisiana if he finds anything in the law books, of which he is such a devotee, that distinguishes between a grass or a leaf roofed capitol and one made of shingles, or one made of some harder material?

Mr. CAFFERY. I find nothing in the law books or in common sense to make any such distinction; but I find that where there is a capital, somebody must know where it is, and it must be accessible to civilized nations.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought the Senator would see the ridiculous result to which his own argument would lead him.

Take our own history during the seven years of the Revolutionary struggle in this country. Our capital followed the Army a portion of the time. It was located at at least half a dozen different places, and in a few instances followed the Army to get away from the enemy. It was a capital on wheels, more completely so than is or has been the capital of the Republic of Cuba, and yet our independence was recognized; we were able to hold off the British power, which was aided by Hessians, until such time as the sense of justice of the civilized world required our recognition; and yet because the struggling Cubans have a capitol constructed of bamboo, with possibly a roof of leaves or grass, which does not rise to the dignity of such a capitol building as we enjoy, the Senator from Louisiana tells us gravely that we can not recognize the belligerency of those people.

Mr. President, as further showing to some extent the existence of the insurgent army in Cuba, I desire to send to the Secretary's desk and have read a communication of Mr. J. Frank Clarke, written from Habana, under date of March 14.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SIZE OF THE CUBAN ARMY—SOME INTERESTING FACTS CONCERNING THE STRENGTH OF THE INSURGENTS—FORTY-THREE THOUSAND MEN IN THE FIELD WITH BUT ONE OBJECT IN LIFE, THEIR FREEDOM—WONDERFUL PROGRESS MADE, NOTWITHSTANDING ALMOST INSURMOUNTABLE OBSTACLES—ARMS AND AMMUNITION NEEDED.

HABANA, March 14.

[Correspondence of the United Press, via Tampa, Fla.]

The present strength of the insurgent army is close to 43,000. Cubans themselves estimate the number of men in the field as high as 60,000, but even if unarmed camp followers, men in charge of provision trains, hospitals, and camps were counted it is doubtful if that number could be found actually in service. There are thousands of Cubans who would willingly cast their lot with the patriotic army, but lack of arms and ammunition prevents.

The insurgent forces operate as a rule in zones or districts and are organized on military lines. The columns of Gomez, Maceo, Lacret, and Banderas are, however, limited to no one province, but pass from one to another under direct orders of Gomez. The commander-in-chief is now in Matanzas and the others have reinvaded Habana Province. The following is a statement of the strength and location of the forces of the principal leaders:

LEADERS AND LOCATIONS.

Maximo Gomez, in Matanzas	6,000
Antonio Maceo, Miro Zalas, and others, in Habana	5,000
Serafim Sanchez, in Santa Clara	4,000
Jose Maceo, Rojas, Rodriguez, in Santiago	3,500
Lacret, in Habana	3,000
Quintin Banderas, in Habana	3,000
Masso Alvarez, Castillo, Memestro, Nunez, in Habana	3,000
Delgado, Bermudez, Sanchez, and others, in Pinar del Rio	2,500
Aguirro, Diaz, Hernandez, Palacios, in Habana	2,500
Mayit, Roderiguez, and others, in Camaguey	1,500
Reyes, Benitez, Vasa, and Mendicita, in Santiago	1,000
Rafael and Cardonas, in Matanzas	800
Verona, Ruperto Sanchez, and others, in Pinar del Rio	800
Oliva and others, in Pinar del Rio	600
Carillo, Joaquin, Garcia, and others, in Santiago	600
Roloff, Pancho, and Perez, in Santa Clara	500
Mirabel, Ferrez, and Veita, in Santa Clara	500
Rego Sixto, Roque, Palao, and Sanchez, in Santa Clara	500
Cortuna, Vidal, and Juan Bravo, in Santa Clara	400
Juan Toledo and El Inglesito, in Santa Clara	400
Mantagas, in Manzas	400
Robau, Cebreco, Ruen, and Planas, in Santiago	400
Borroto, Lancho, Sardinas, and Eduardo Garcia, in Matanzas	400
Aulit, Mosjon, Dimas, Martinez, and Sorolongo, in Matanzas	400
Villancoa, Acosta, Aguilar, and others, in Habana	300
Munez, Chapotin, Sosorro, and Lino Perez, in Santa Clara	200
Total	42,800

HOW THEY ARE DISTRIBUTED.

The distribution according to provinces is: Habana, 16,800; Matanzas, 8,000; Santa Clara, 6,500; Santiago, 5,500; Pinar del Rio, 3,900; Camaguay, 2,100; total, 42,800.

In addition to the above, there are innumerable local bands from 15 men to 50 or even 100. These do not form a part of the fighting force and should not be counted as part of the army. Their chief functions are to carry out the orders of Gomez, prohibiting the grinding of cane, the movement of troops and supplies by rail, the shipment of provisions to cities, the suppression of "plateados" who rob, burn, and commit other crimes. These small bands serve as recruiting agencies, and when they grow too large for local operation they are attached to one of the army columns. Of the army proper, fully two-thirds are well mounted, and about half are well armed. The others are armed with shotguns, revolvers, or only machetes.

CHOPPED WIRE FOR SHOT.

Some of Maceo's men have old-style muzzle-loading guns, and lead is so scarce that telegraph wires chopped into short lengths is used for the charge. Spanish surgeons have on several occasions reported soldiers wounded with bits of wire. The insurgents have a few pieces of mounted cannon captured from Government troops. There are perhaps a dozen of these guns, which have been used with disastrous effect against the small wooden forts which the Spanish troops have erected at various points.

The Cuban army of liberation, as it is called, has grown to its present size in the face of almost insurmountable difficulties. From the beginning it has been outnumbered by the army of Spain, in never less than four to one. It has escaped annihilation in many encounters when ammunition ran out. It has lived on forage, been almost constantly under fire, and is to-day a reckless, dare-devil army with but one view, and that is to free Cuba. What comes after is not given a thought.

J. FRANK CLARKE.

Mr. ALLEN. Similar articles have appeared in the press from time to time for the last year, and especially for the last few months, and I take it for granted the people of the United States, and especially the Senate of the United States, can no longer doubt that a state of war exists in Cuba and that the insurgent forces are at least under martial law, having a regular military organization, and that their troops amount to many thousands.

I conclude, therefore, that there is but one of two things for the people of the United States to do, either to remain passive and inactive and let the throats of the Cubans be cut by the Spaniards, or to take prompt and efficient action for the recognition not only of the belligerency of Cuba, but its political recognition.

The distinction, as I understand, between belligerency and independence is of so shadowy a character that I can not understand why the Senate hesitates to make the recognition full or to recognize the political independence of those people. The only distinction, as I am informed, is as to the right of the Cubans to be represented at this capital by a minister or an ambassador.

I have sometimes been led to doubt the sincerity of these resolutions—and I dislike very much to doubt their sincerity—because they have not been put in an authoritative form. It has been said here by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and it seems to be conceded all around, that the resolutions are simply advisory. Now, why make them advisory merely? If the struggling patriots of Cuba are entitled to any recognition whatever at our hands, why not give them that kind of recognition which will be of benefit to them? Why say to the people of Cuba who are waging this war for the preservation of their political rights, for the preservation of their homes, for the preservation of their wives and children, "We sympathize with you, but we can not extend to you aid under these circumstances"?

Mr. President, it occurs to me that it would be no more cruel to place water within the sight of a dying man upon a desert and to say to him, "We sympathize with you, but we can not give you the water." If we stand here and suffer Spain to apply the knife to the throats of the Cubans, we will be justly chargeable in the eyes of the civilized world with impotency and with cowardice. Why not put these resolutions in the form of a joint resolution? Why not send them to the President of the United States and say to him, "Sign these resolutions, make them a part of the law of the country, or take the responsibility of inviting the adverse criticism of your countrymen?"

A few days ago Senators in this Chamber, to use a phrase which probably is not altogether parliamentary, were falling over one another to vote for the resolution. There was a wonderful burst of patriotism and patriotic sentiment here, among Republicans and Democrats alike—and Populists were inspired a little, too—in order to demonstrate to the world by our votes that we not only sympathized with Cuba, but that we were willing, if need be, to afford her substantial aid under these distressing circumstances. Yet our patriotism has been sifting out from that moment to this, until it is very doubtful whether the resolutions can pass here to-day. First came the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] antagonizing the resolutions, then the honorable senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and finally the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I guess, has concluded that it is about time for him to retreat, and we are offered the resolution now before the Senate to recommit the Cuban resolutions for further consideration. I suppose that is the end of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will again be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution of the Senate in regard to the insurrection in Cuba, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. LODGE were appointed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPPEL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter;

A bill (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and an assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes";

A bill (S. 2251) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River; and

A bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) hereby expresses its earnest desire and hope that Cuba may soon become a free, independent, and republican government, and that the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government to secure such result.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH ARKANSAS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and setttlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas, which is the unfinished business, be again temporarily laid aside, so that it may not lose its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the consent of the Senate that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be first considered and disposed of as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. PEFFER. Is it the intention of the Senator from Illinois to ask that only the amendments proposed by the committee be disposed of on the first reading?

Mr. CULLOM. That they be disposed of on the first reading of the bill.

Mr. PEFFER. Other amendments to come in afterwards?

Mr. CULLOM. And then that the bill be open to amendment as the Senate sees proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and that course will be pursued.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say to the Senator from Illinois that, as he well knows, there are provisions in the bill in regard to marshals and district attorneys. The Committee on the Judiciary, at the request of the Committee on Appropriations, have considered that subject and have communicated to the Committee on Appropriations their result; but there are a few cases where Senators desired to be heard after the committee had acted—about a half dozen in all. The committee have made a supplementary report. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not take up that part of the bill until to-morrow, because that report can not come in in print until then.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not suppose that that portion of the bill will be reached before that time, but if the Senator desires that it shall not be disposed of until to-morrow morning I am perfectly willing.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate reaches that part of the bill I ask the Senator to reserve those particular amendments until to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I will say to the Senator in charge of the bill that I should like to have the provision relating to clerk hire in the office of the surveyor-general of Oregon go over until to-morrow.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the provision for office of the Secretary of the Senate, on page 2, line 17, after the word "each," to insert "and $500 additional to the financial clerk, while the office is held by the present incumbent"; so as to read:

Chief clerk, and financial clerk, at $3,000 each, and $500 additional to the financial clerk, while the office is held by the present incumbent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 23, page 2.

Mr. PLATT. In line 23 there is a provision for "librarian, $2,220." I should like to inquire if the committee has considered whether his salary ought not to be increased. I do not know that it is in order to speak of it now, but before we get through with the bill I wish the committee would consider the matter.

Mr. CULLOM. I know what the Senator from Connecticut refers to. The committee did consider the proposition, but, so far as I personally am concerned, when the committee amendments are disposed of, I shall have no objection to referring to it again.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 8, to increase the total for office of the Secretary of the Senate from $64,806.90 to $65,306.90.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 23, on page 4.

Mr. CULLOM. In line 23, on page 4, the words "Epidemic Diseases" should be stricken out, because of the recent change. It should be the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the words "Epidemic Diseases" and insert in lieu thereof "Public Health and National Quarantine."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, after line 3, to insert:

For clerks to the Committees on Woman Suffrage, Mines and Mining, Immigration, Revision of the Laws of the United States, Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, Indian Depredations, and Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at $2,100 each, $14,700.

Mr. HILL. I should like to hear some explanation of this amendment, as to whether the amounts are changed or whether additional clerks are provided.

Mr. CULLOM. In the passage of the bill in the other House there were several mistakes in footing up the total amounts, which have been corrected by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, so that I think they are now correct. On page 5 provision is made for quite a number of additional clerks to committees who have not heretofore received the annual salary now provided in the amendment. That, of course, changes the total expense of the paragraph.

Mr. HILL. I had the honor to be chairman of the Committee on Immigration for about two years. It is not an exceedingly laborious committee, yet we reported some bills, we conducted some investigations, and we discharged our duties in a reasonably satisfactory manner, I assume. The clerk of that committee was given the extravagant compensation of about $1,400. I have now been succeeded as chairman by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but I am still a member of the committee.

I am not aware of any necessity for a change in the salary of the clerk. I am not aware of any new duties which have been added to those of the clerk, and I do not understand the discrimination proposed to be made. It is in regard to that matter that I ask for some information. Why has this committee assumed such proportions lately? What new duties have been added to it? I should like to know why it is proposed to jump the salary of the clerk from $1,440 to $2,100. I do not refer to the additional clerks added in this paragraph, but to the additional salaries. It strikes me that some of those committees have very little to do. I am not complaining of that. I simply wanted to know why it was that under the previous administration of the Senate the clerk of the Committee on Immigration, who was my clerk, was given $1,440 a year and the new clerk is to be given $2,100 a year. If anyone can tell me the reason why that is done, then I am satisfied.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose one of the reasons why the clerk of the committee when the Senator was chairman received only $1,440 was because the Senator did not ask for an increase. I do not know how that may be. There are perhaps only two or three of the committees mentioned in this amendment the clerks of which are paid a higher salary than they have heretofore received. For instance, the clerk of the first committee mentioned has for a number of years been an annual clerk, and the same is true of several other committees named.

Mr. HILL. What was the salary of the clerk of the Committee on Woman Suffrage? It is a most important committee, of course, and the duties must be very laborious.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment, especially in reference to the Committee on Immigration. Two Congresses ago I had the honor of being chairman of that committee. It was one of the busiest and hardest worked committees of the Senate, of course, under those conditions and considering the subject-matter that came before the committee. I thought then that the clerkship ought to be placed in the highest grade. If I had continued chairman of the committee I should have asked to have that done.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me a moment? Was the clerk of the committee during your administration paid $1,440?

Mr. CHANDLER. He was paid the same salary that he received in the last Congress. The Senator will see the point as I get on. I did not succeed in getting that clerkship raised, but I bear testimony to-day to the fact that the committee is of sufficient importance to have such a clerk. It ought to have had it two Congresses ago. It ought to have had it in the last Congress, when the Senator from New York was the able and diligent chairman of the committee. It ought to have it now, when the young and enthusiastic Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is chairman of the committee.

I am obliged to say, however, that the salaries of these clerks are adjusted somewhat by the all-wise Committee on Appropriations with some reference to the personnel of the chairmanships. If the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] or the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] were to find himself at the head of any committee of the Senate, considering his long service in the Senate, he would be given a clerk of the highest grade. I was surprised, I must confess, when the distinguished Senator from New York, coming from the governorship of the Empire State to grace this Chamber with his person and his eloquence, became chairman of the Committee on Immigration that the then dominant party in this Chamber did not give him a clerkship adequate not only to the work of the committee, but to the character and standing of the Senator himself. I think that the majority of this House ought to have given a clerkship to the committee commensurate with its personnel and commensurate with the importance of its services, and I assure the Senator I should have cooperated with great earnestness and cordiality, if he had remained chairman of the committee until this time, in having the clerkship advanced.

I now think that the conclusion of the Committee on Appropriations ought to be accepted without any demur not only with reference to this committee, but with reference to the other committees where they propose to raise the salaries of the clerks. It is a difficult matter to adjust. Unless all the committees have clerkships of one grade it must be difficult to draw the line. But the Committee on Appropriations have done it as well as they could. They have been influenced not only by the consideration of the important duties which the committees have to perform, but somewhat by the character and standing and position in the Senate of the various chairmen of the committees.

I hope, therefore, that the Senator from New York will not undertake either on this or any other occasion (indeed he and I know it is vain) to make any attempt to impugn the exceeding wisdom and impartiality of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, I should like to hear further from the Senator from Illinois who has the bill in charge as to the basis upon which this adjustment is made. I observe that the amendment as reported by the Committee on Appropriations provides that the clerk to the Committee on Woman Suffrage shall receive $2,100 a year. I do not know that that committee has had a meeting during the present session. I know that during the past Congress there were two or three meetings of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, but at the present session I believe they have had none. The Committee on Mines and Mining I believe is quite an important committee, and I do not object to the raising of the salary of the clerk to that committee. I do not think that the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States has had a meeting during the present session. The Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia I do not think has had a meeting during the present session. The Committee on Indian Depredations has had one short meeting of half an hour, when a quorum was not present. The Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal I believe has not had a meeting at the present session.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; they have. They have been in session all the time.

Mr. KYLE. In session all the time?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, all the time.

Mr. KYLE. I think that all our committees are in session all the time, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator that every member of that committee is charged with a particular part of the work, and he is working at it like a man and doing his best.

Mr. KYLE. I presume that is true of every committee. Each member has specific matters referred to him, and then the committee meet and confer.

Mr. MORGAN. They have not conferred yet, but at the same time they are engaged in preparing their work so as to submit it to the Senate.

Mr. KYLE. But what I am trying to get at is the basis of this discrimination.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will bear in mind that a great many of these committees are so very busy that they have no time for meetings.

Mr. KYLE. That is a very important observation. I am glad to know it.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from South Dakota will permit me, I will state very frankly why I voted for the increase in the committee and why I shall vote for it in the Senate. The clerk of this committee also really does the work of a secretary of a Senator. He not only has to attend to the duties of the committee and all the work of the committee, including all the correspondence and obtaining the information necessary to lay before the committee on matters that come before it, but he also has to perform the duties that are devolved upon the secretary of every Senator who has not the chairmanship of a committee. For that reason I thought there should be a discrimination between those gentlemen who had more labor imposed upon them than the clerks of Senators who receive $1,200 a year.

Mr. KYLE. I am not complaining about the salary of the clerks, but about the discrimination. I wish to say in reference to my own committee that we have had eight or ten meetings at the present session, each one lasting an hour or an hour and a half. We have had important hearings, where we have had to hire our own stenographer, and I presume allowance is not made for that in the appropriation bill. We have paid for the stenographer from our own pockets. What I am complaining of is the discrimination in regard to the clerks of the various committees. I realize, as does the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], that the salary paid to these clerks is very small, considering the amount of work that they do. Not only the committee work is imposed upon these clerks, but also the work necessitated as private secretaries to Senators. The salary that is paid to the majority of the committee clerks, $2,100, is not too large; but I wish the Committee on Appropriations might reach a proper and impartial basis where all these clerks should be paid the full and maximum amount. I do not believe in being stingy in regard to these matters. I should like to hear from the Senator who has the bill in charge in regard to the matter.

Mr. CALL. Nearly all the clerks of the committees mentioned in this paragraph have been paid this salary for many years. The Committee on Woman Suffrage has been alluded to here as not having had any meeting. That committee represents a great body of public sentiment in this country. It was created at the earnest solicitation and demand of a large number of the women of the United States, who met in this city when holding their conferences. The committee was given a clerk ranking with the other committees upon their special request. The correspondence of that clerk is very great. There is a great public sentiment in this country, whether we agree to it or disagree to it, of the intelligent women of the country, zealous and earnest in what they conceive to be a measure of great importance to the public and to themselves. The clerk of the committee has to my knowledge paid out of his salary a monthly sum for the purpose of keeping up the business of the committee and the duties imposed upon him. In respect to the dignity of the committee in representing a great public sentiment, in representing an earnest public sentiment, the Committee on Appropriations have only acted in deference to the requests of a vast number of the intelligent women of the United States. They have a right to be heard and a right to be represented in the committees of this body.

Mr. CULLOM. I have been called upon by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] to explain the amendment. There is very little explanation, it seems to me, necessary. The committee, with the representations before it, thought they ought to make many of the clerks of committees annual clerks. The Senate is misled to an extent, because several of the committees named already have annual clerks. The Committee on Woman Suffrage, as the Senator from Florida has said, has had an annual clerk for a good many years.

Mr. KYLE. At what salary?

Mr. CULLOM. Two thousand one hundred dollars, I think; the usual amount. So has the Committee on Mines and Mining. As to the Committee on the Nicaragua Canal, in view of the work that that committee will be compelled to discharge, the great question it has under consideration, in which the country is very much interested, and the distinguished character of the Senator who is chairman of that committee, the Committee on Appropriations thought it was only common fairness that the committee should have an annual clerk to aid it in the discharge of its work.

The Committee on Appropriations has tried to do the best it could, as has been said, with reference to these committees. Appeals were made to it by different Senators. The Senator from South Dakota will observe that as we are getting along I apprehend it will not be very many years before it will be shown that the work of every committee in the Senate will be such as to necessitate an annual clerk. The Committee on Appropriations hardly felt at liberty to adopt that scheme at present, but we went as far as we could under the circumstances. I hope we shall have a vote on the amendment and proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say one word more in regard to the Committee on Woman Suffrage. That is a very important committee. The Senate have always undertaken to constitute that committee as one of gravity and they have made it a committee of importance. The chairman two Congresses ago was the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who has been very long in the service of the Government in the Senate. The present chairman, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], has been in the Senate nearly as long as any member upon the other side of the Chamber. I have no doubt that these facts entered into the minds of the members of the Committee on Appropriations in determining what the rank of this clerkship should be.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] said that the Committee on Woman Suffrage has not much work to do. The committee, to my knowledge, has had repeated hearings. It hears with patience all the delegations of the women of the country who come here to argue the progressing cause of woman suffrage. It has always had hearings and has had as much work to do as almost any committee in the Senate. I do not know whether the Senator from Florida said that or not, but he will correct me if I am wrong.

There is the Senator from Florida, who, in addition to doing the duties of this committee with zeal and with diligence, does as much or more work for his constituents, the people of Florida, as is done by any other Senator here for his constituency. No Senator from New York or from Pennsylvania works any harder for his constituents in those great States than the Senator from Florida works for his constituents of Florida, which, by the way, is a little larger in area than the State of New York. The Senator from Florida goes all over it, and knows all about it, and works for its people. I regret that the Senator from South Dakota should wish to deprive that Senator of the little recognition which his character and services in the Senate have received from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KYLE. The Senator from South Dakota does not wish to deprive the Senator from Florida of the emoluments of his committee. I am glad, indeed, that he has them. The only thing I wish is that the rest of us had the same privileges under the laws of the United States. I was going to move before the close of the discussion, and I will now move, to amend the amendment of the committee by adding to the list the rest of the standing committees of the Senate, whatever they are.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, in consideration of the importance of the work, as we know, which is intrusted now to the Committee on the Nicaragua Canal, as it is called, it has been a standing committee of the Senate. It will have to remain a standing committee of the Senate for years and years to come if that canal is built; and if it is not built, it is equally important that the Senate should have a standing committee until the time arrives when we can build it. The duties of that committee are going to be and are now very onerous. For instance, this morning I received a list, after quite a laborious correspondence, of as many as six of the presidents and controllers of the great canals of the world, from whom I have to obtain maps and reports and data for the satisfaction of this body upon every question connected with this very important affair, because we can not afford to take any step in regard to the Nicaragua Canal in the dark, or at least very few. Some of them, of course, we have to take without full knowledge, but we must be thoroughly informed upon every step that we take in regard to this enormous affair, this great outlay, if we make it. It is a most important work.

The labor of that committee, by concurrence among the membership of it, there being seven members of the committee, has been divided up into seven distinct heads, and very naturally so. Each Senator is at work upon his own particular duty, the duty that has been assigned to him, and in that way the committee is preparing a report upon all of these separate and distinct heads. When those reports are drawn together, I suppose that the Senate of the United States will not have received in regard to any public enterprise more accurate or thorough information than will be imparted by the labors of these gentlemen. It is necessary to keep the office open. It is necessary to have a clerk here in vacation as well as during the sessions of the Senate. He will be busy during all the coming summer. If the canal is to be built the Senate of the United States will be making constant requirements upon that committee for information. I regard it as really one of the most laborious committees of the body connected with a single subject.

But added to that is the former duty of considering claims against the Government of Nicaragua in favor of American citizens. If the work of the committee has been necessarily slow in that direction, it is not that they have omitted to perform any duty about it at all, but that the Government of the United States for reasons of its own, reasons doubtless of proper public policy, has not considered it necessary heretofore to press those claims upon the Government of Nicaragua. But they are important claims, and in my judgment many of them are very just claims. We are dealing with a Government there that has not any great ability to pay. Even that branch of the subject makes it necessary to have the supervision of the claims in favor of our own people that have been referred to the committee. I think the Senate would be doing injustice to that committee if it did not give to its clerk the salary that is paid to other standing committees of the Senate.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I began pretty early in the session to endeavor to tear down the expenses of the Senate by reducing the expenses of dead Senators. I discovered in the comments of the newspaper press of the country that there was a good deal of interest manifested to see whether we could not effect some sort of legislation that would reduce the expenses of live Senators. I was very much gratified to see a short time ago that my amiable neighbor from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] joined me in what I thought were laudable efforts in the direction of economy and asked for certain information that the Sergeant-at-Arms could give to the Senate better than any other officer of the body. I see that the newspapers, in commenting upon the figures that the Senator himself submitted to the committee, and it is the general sentiment of the newspaper men, say that a great deal of economy could be practiced wisely in the direction of curtailing not only the number of officers attached to the Senate, but their cost. Now I find that the Senator from New Hampshire has taken the other tack. I do not know whether that is because he was connected with the Navy so long, but at any rate it is a fact.

I am perfectly willing that all the committees enumerated in the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations shall have clerks, but I am not willing that those clerks shall have higher salaries than other persons of equal grade who do quite as much work and are quite as important. I do not know that the character of the chairman has anything to do with the work of the clerk of the committee. Now I move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that there is an amendment pending to the committee's amendment.

Mr. PEFFER. What is the pending amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, in line 7, page 5, the word "and," and after the word "Canal," in line 8, insert "and all other standing committees"; so as to read:

Indian Depredations, Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, and all other standing committees, at $2,100 each.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow us to go on through the bill and then come back to this question.

Mr. PEFFER. I am not willing to allow the bill to go on until we have discussed this amendment.

Mr. CALL. There are quite a number of other amendments reported by the committee, which will give rise to no discussion, if we can proceed with the bill.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois, as I desire to make some investigation in reference to other committees, that he allow this paragraph to be passed over for the present.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to allowing the paragraph to be passed over for the present, if desired, so that we can go on with the bill.

Mr. CALL. It can be passed over informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paragraph will be passed over, without objection. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, line 10, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "twenty-one," and in line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-seven thousand four hundred and forty" and insert "thirty thousand two hundred and forty"; so as to make the clause read:

For twenty-one clerks to committees, at $1,440 each; in all, $30,240.

Mr. BAKER. If the preceding paragraph is to be postponed, then all the subject-matter contained in lines 10, 11, 12, and 13 ought also to be laid over along with the other, because it is quite evident that there are very many clerks embraced in the pending amendment who do as much or more work than the clerks who are mentioned in the preceding amendment which has just been passed over.

Mr. CULLOM. If there is to be any discussion at all about clerks to committees the two paragraphs might as well go over together, so that they will come up later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will also be passed over, without objection.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to move an amendment, to come in at the end of this paragraph. I move that the compensation of these 21 clerks be increased to $1,800 each, instead of $1,440.

Mr. CULLOM. That amendment to the amendment of the committee can be regarded as pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be received. The paragraph will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, line 23, before the word "messengers," to strike out "thirty-six" and insert "forty-six"; so as to read:

Office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper: For Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, $4,500; horse and wagon for his use, $420, or so much thereof as may be necessary; for clerk to Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; assistant doorkeeper, $2,592; acting assistant doorkeeper, $2,592; three messengers, acting as assistant doorkeepers, at $1,800 each; forty-six messengers, at $1,440 each.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to inquire of the Senator who has charge of the bill the object of increasing the number of messengers.

Mr. CULLOM. The Sergeant-at-Arms was before the committee and gave us all the information that seemed to be necessary, and we agreed to report this increase of messengers, because ten of the messengers are now on the rolls as skilled laborers and perform the duties of messengers. The Sergeant-at-Arms believed, and the committee came to the conclusion, that it was only right that the ten should be made messengers, instead of remaining as they have been heretofore.

Mr. PEFFER. Then it is simply a transfer from one position to another?

Mr. CULLOM. Simply a transfer. The effect of it is to promote them.

Mr. PEFFER. Shifting them from one department to another?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, line 5, after the word "each," to strike out "eleven skilled laborers, at $1,000 each," and insert "skilled laborer, $1,000"; so as to read:

Assistant messenger on the floor of the Senate, $1,440; messenger to Official Reporter's room, $1,440; messenger in charge of storeroom, $1,200; upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440; two carpenters to assist him, at $960 each; skilled laborer, $1,000.

Mr. PEFFER. This amendment as to "skilled laborer" I discover is a change in phraseology. What kind of work does this skilled laborer perform?

Mr. CULLOM. The skilled laborer is one who has been in the service of the Senate for twenty-odd years, and is in the performance of his duties down in the basement of the building. It is merely proposed to pay him just exactly what he has received heretofore.

Mr. PEFFER. That does not answer my question. Is it not the fact this man is a barber?

Mr. CULLOM. I am not sure whether he is or not.

Mr. PEFFER. Does the Senator wish to be understood as saying he does not know?

Mr. CULLOM. I really do not know the exact duty in which the man is engaged.

Mr. PEFFER. I object to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the man has been there for twenty-three years. That is the information that was given to me, according to my recollection.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kansas surely does not object to reducing 11 skilled laborers down to 1 skilled laborer. It can not be that the Senator objects to that.

Mr. CULLOM. We shall be saving money by the proposed change.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kansas does not wish to discharge the skilled laborer we have got here?

Mr. PEFFER. In answer to my question propounded a moment ago, I understand that there has been a transfer of 10 messengers about the Senate wing of the Capitol from one class to another. On the next page of the bill I see an amendment has been proposed by the committee for the change; but there is still left "skilled laborer," and when I ask what this skilled laborer does, the Senator says he is unable to inform me.

Mr. CULLOM. That skilled laborer is not a messenger, but is employed in the basement of the building in charge of some branch of the service. He has been there for twenty-three years, with the same salary he now gets, perhaps, for most of the time. At least he has been employed for several years at the exact salary which is provided in this bill, as I am informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. PEFFER. That is all very plain, but still I do not learn what I want to know, and that is, what this man is doing.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall endeavor to find out during the day and inform the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suppose the man is a barber; does it not require skill to shave the other Senators—not the Senator from Kansas or myself. [Laughter.] If this barber is doing this work, does it not require skill in handling a razor upon the faces of Senators?

Mr. PEFFER. Not in my case. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kansas has allowed the increase proposed on page 5, which has been satisfactorily explained to him, to go on; and now, in the interest of economy, the Senator from Kansas objects to the reduction, which is in some measure to compensate us for the increase proposed on page 5, and wants to strike that out. The Senator wants to know whether the provision means the employment of a skillful barber to shave the other Senators of this body. I think it does. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEFFER. My object is to get rid of the barbers in the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator if it is fair, because he and I do not need a barber, that we should not be willing other Senators should have the little luxury of this skilled laborer. I want some large measure of reform, and I am willing that some small measure of reform shall be made. But, of course, if the Senator insists upon having a vote of the Senate on striking out this provision, we will have it; but I think we had better seize, on reflection, the $10,000 and fasten it onto the committee, for otherwise there is danger, if it is not done now, that before the bill is disposed of they will withdraw that economy.

Mr. PEFFER. What I object to is that Senators employ barbers to do their barbering work for them at the expense of the people of the country. It is time that public attention should be called to this and a great many other items of expenditure which are not only unnecessary, but are viciously extravagant, and it is time that a halt be called somewhere. If we go through this bill we will find a great many different items that ought to be stricken out, and so far as I can keep up with them I propose to ask that they be stricken out, not only in reference to laborers and barbers, but in due time for Senators themselves, so that we shall show a disposition to economize in the expenditures for ourselves as well as in larger transactions.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations to the Senate carries with it a smaller amount by $345,843.37 than the act of last year.

The fact is, that it is about the same amount this year that it was away back in 1886, and so on down for several years, carrying a much larger sum than is contained in the present bill. While it is very well to talk about economy, and for us to economize, yet there are some things which we have to do.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator please state for the information of the Senate in what particular item or items this saving three hundred or four hundred thousand dollars has been exercised? There seems to have been a rise, so far as we have already gone, and I should like to know where in the bill is this economy to be found.

Mr. CULLOM. I will tell the Senator. For instance, in the report made by the Committee on Appropriations he will find on the second page:

Civil Service Commission, two messenger boys, at $400 each, in lieu of one messenger, at $840 (net)	$40.00
Watchmen on Capitol Grounds, seven at $840 each	5,880.00
Total reduction	5,920.00

The total amount this bill carries, as reported to the Senate, is $21,545,874.71 as against $21,891,718.08 last year.

Mr. HILL. Still my question remains unanswered, whereabouts is this large reduction made? It can not be in the few items for laborers, etc., for that is only a small amount.

Mr. CULLOM. I call attention to another item.

Collecting internal revenue.—Provision for salaries and expenses of 306 additional deputy collectors, aggregating $408,600, and for ten additional revenue agents, aggregating $36,000.

There is a saving of nearly half a million dollars. There are a number of other items footing up a large aggregate.

Mr. HILL. Were not some of these inserted in the bill of last year on account of the intended collection of the income tax?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. And dropped out now, of course. The committee could not help it; they had to drop them out.

Mr. CULLOM. The law was decided to be unconstitutional; the tax which has been collected has been returned; the force required for the purpose of executing the law is not needed; and so the committee got rid of that part of the expense.

Mr. HILL. Has the Senator before him, in any written report, or otherwise, an exact table showing the various reductions?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes. If the Senator will send for House Report No. 415, which was made upon this bill, he will find very many items of interest to him. The Appropriations Committee of the Senate made a very brief report which accompanied the bill, Senate Report No. 532.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 13, before the word "laborers," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "two laborers, at $840 each; twenty"; so as to read:

Two janitors, at $900 each; laborer in charge of private passage, $840 each; two female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring room, at $720 each; telephone operator, $720; telephone page, $600; two laborers, at $840 each; twenty laborers, at $720 each.

Mr. HILL. Where were the 25 laborers, who are now decreased to 2, originally employed?

Mr. CULLOM. They were employed all over the Senate wing of the Capitol. I can not undertake to designate the exact places in the building where each man was employed, but they were under the control of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and were used wherever they were needed in keeping the building in order and in the performance of their duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 6, line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred and eighty" and insert "eight hundred and forty," and in line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifteen thousand eight hundred and sixty-four" and insert "eighteen thousand five hundred and four"; so as to make the clause read:

Sixteen pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $4,840; in all, $118,504.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 22, after the word "dollars," to strike out "clerk in post-office, $1,800," and on page 7, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "nineteen thousand three" and insert "seventeen thousand five"; so as to make the clause read:

Post-office: For postmaster, $2,250; assistant postmaster and mail carrier, $2,088; seven mail carriers and one wagon master, at $1,200 each; four riding pages, at $912.50 each; in all, $17,588.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 8, to insert:

For thirty-eight annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $1,200 each, $45,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; so as to make the clause read:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 23, after the word "cleaning," to insert "repairing"; so as to make the clause read:

For services in cleaning, repairing, and varnishing furniture, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 17, before the word "privates," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-seven"; and in line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "thirty-nine thousand nine" and insert "fifty-three thousand one"; so as to make the clause read:

CAPITOL POLICE.

For captain, $1,600; three lieutenants, at $1,200 each; thirty-seven privates, at $1,100 each; and eight watchmen at $900 each; in all, $53,100, one-half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 23, before the word "hundred," to strike out "one" and insert "three"; so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 24, to increase the total of the appropriation for the expenses of the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives from "$84,144" to "$84,168."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand" and insert "eight hundred," and in line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "six" and insert "four"; so as to make the clause read:

Under Architect of the Capitol: For chief engineer, $1,700; two assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; four conductors of the elevators, at $1,100 each, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Architect of the Capitol; laborer, $820; five firemen, at $900 each; electrician, $1,200; laborer, $800; laborer to clean Statuary Hall and watch statuary therein, $660; in all, $16,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve thousand six hundred and thirty-six" and insert "thirteen thousand and sixty-eight"; so as to make the clause read:

For eighteen clerks to committees, at $6 each per day during the session, $13,068.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 25, after the word "and," to strike out "nineteen dollars and eighty-four cents" and insert "forty dollars"; on page 15, line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "six hundred and fifty-two" and insert "nine hundred and eighty-two"; in line 12, after the word "and," to strike out "forty-six dollars and fifty-six cents" and insert "and sixty dollars"; in line 14, after the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and forty-one dollars and seventy cents" and insert "four hundred dollars"; and in line 20, before the word "cents," to strike out "twenty thousand nine hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty" and insert "twenty-one thousand three hundred and forty-six dollars and fifty"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $3,500; and for hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary; assistant doorkeeper, superintendent of document room, assistant superintendent of document room, and department messenger, at $2,000 each; one special employee (John T. Chancey), $1,500; one special employee, $1,500; document file clerk, $1,400; assistant document file clerk, $1,314; clerk to Doorkeeper, and janitor, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, including the messenger to the reporters' gallery, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, at $1,000 each; six laborers, at $720 each; two laborers in the water-closet, at $720 each, three laborers, including two in the cloakrooms, at $600 each; female attendant in ladies' retiring room, $720; superintendent of folding room, $2,000; three clerks in folding room, one at $1,800, and two at $1,200 each; foreman, $1,500; messenger, $1,200; folder in sealing room, $1,200; page, $500; laborer, $720; ten folders, at $900 each; five folders, at $840 each; three folders during the session, at $70 per month each, $840; fifteen folders, at $720 each; night watchman, $900; driver, $600; fourteen messengers, on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; two chief pages, at $900 each; thirty-three pages, boys not under 12 years of age, during the session, including two riding pages, one telephone page, and one telegraph page, at $2.50 per day each, $9,982.50; two messengers during the session, at $70 per month each, $560; ten laborers during the session, at $60 per month each, $2,400; six laborers, known as cloakroom men, at $50 per month each; horse and buggy, for Department messenger, $250; in all, $121,346.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 22, after the word "thousand," to strike out "and"; so as to make the clause read:

For employment of Joel Grayson in document room, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 4, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred and sixty-one dollars and twenty cents" and insert "six hundred dollars," and in line 7, after the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred and eighty-one dollars and twenty cents" and insert "two hundred and thirty dollars"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of postmaster: For postmaster, $2,500; first assistant postmaster, $2,000; ten messengers, including messenger to superintend transportation of mails, at $1,200 each; three messengers, during the session, at $900 each; four messengers, at $100 per month each, during the session, $1,600; and one laborer, $720; in all, $21,230.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 21, before the word "days," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "twenty-one"; so as to make the clause read:

That wherever the words "during the session" occur in the foregoing paragraphs they shall be construed to mean four months, or one hundred and twenty-one days.

Mr. HALE. In the appropriations for the Library of Congress, on page 19, line 3, I move to strike out "eight" and insert "eleven."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 3, before the word "clerks," it is proposed to strike out "eight" and insert "eleven"; so as to read:

For the employment of eleven clerks, at $900 each, under the direction of the Librarian of Congress, necessary for the execution of the copyright law, $7,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. The total ought to be changed, in view of that amendment, from $7,200 to $9,900.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 5, after the word "law," it is proposed to strike out "$7,200" and insert "$9,900."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 19, after line 6, to insert:

For register of copyrights, $2,000, who shall be selected by the Committee on the Library of the two Houses of Congress, shall give bond, shall have and exercise all the rights and duties touching copyrights now devolved upon the Librarian of Congress, and shall make weekly deposits and monthly reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand and five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; and on page 21, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "thirty-three thousand seven" and insert "thirty-five thousand two"; so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to the following in the office of the President of the United States: Private secretary, $5,000; assistant secretary, $2,500; one executive clerk and disbursing officer, and one executive clerk, at $2,000 each; two clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; steward, $1,800; usher to the President, $1,800; chief doorkeeper, $1,800; four doorkeepers, at $1,200 each; four messengers, at $1,200 each; watchman, $900; and engineer, who is also the fireman, $1,000; in all, $35,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 19, after the word "each," to strike out "one messenger" and insert "two messenger boys, at $400 each"; and in line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "and forty"; so as to make the clause read:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For three Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,000; eight clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; fifteen clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; two messenger boys, at $400 each; two laborers; engineer, $840; and two watchmen; in all, $91,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 9, after the word "each," to insert "law clerk, $2,100"; in line 16, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eight" and insert "ten"; and in line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seventeen thousand eight" and insert "twenty-one thousand seven"; so as to make the clause read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; Assistant Secretary, $4,500; Second and Third Assistant Secretaries, at $3,500 each; chief clerk, $2,500; for six chiefs of bureaus and one translator, at $2,100 each; law clerk, $2,100; private secretary to the Secretary, $2,000; eleven clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; seven clerks of class 2; one clerk of class 2, for indexing records, $1,400; sixteen clerks of class 1, one of whom is to be a telegraph operator; five clerks, at $1,000 each; ten clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; three assistant messengers; packer, $720; ten laborers; in all, $121,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 20, to insert:

For services of employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude for the work of compiling and distributing consular and other commercial reports, namely, one clerk, at $1,400; one clerk, at $1,000; one clerk, at $900, and one laborer, at $660; in all, $3,960, the same to be paid from the appropriation of $20,000 for preparation, printing, publication, and distribution, by the Department of State, of the consular and other commercial reports made in the diplomatic and consular appropriation act approved February 27, 1896.

Mr. GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to explain the provision for certain employees in the State Department, particularly that portion of it which is found in lines 22 and 23.

Mr. CULLOM. This force has heretofore been paid out of the general appropriation for the Department, but the ruling of the Comptroller is such that the Department can not do it any longer. They can not so pay them. Therefore the Secretary of State asked that this provision should be inserted in the bill. It does not take any money out of the Treasury outside of what has been appropriated heretofore.

If the Senator will look on page 3 of the report the committee made he will see that the Secretary of State writes as follows:

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith two items additional to the estimates of appropriations previously transmitted.

These items are made necessary by the discovery that a practice which has obtained of paying employees of the Bureau of Statistics of this Department from the annual appropriation for the preparation, printing, publication, and distribution of the consular and other commercial reports, and which was supposed to be warranted by the language of the appropriation, is in conflict with the act of August 5, 1882 (section 4, 22 Stat. L., 255), which prohibits the employment of persons by any Department, "except only at such rates and in such numbers, respectively, as may be specifically appropriated by Congress for such clerical and other personal services for each fiscal year." In order that this practice may be discontinued without embarrassment to the important work of editing, publishing, and distributing the consular reports, and of compiling the annual volume, Commercial Relations, one of the items is submitted for insertion in the deficiency act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, in order that it may be immediately available, and the other in the regular appropriations for salaries of the Department of State in the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The Secretary writes quite an extended letter upon the subject, which seemed to make it necessary, if we are going to retain the force and engage in this work, that we should make an appropriation for the purpose more specific than heretofore.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate and of the Senator to the fact that this provision as framed is "for services of employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude for the work of compiling and distributing consular and other commercial reports." Here a provision is proposed to be inserted authorizing the employment of this particular force, which, I understand, takes them outside of the civil service and makes them personal appointments under the Secretary of State. Is that the object of the language which I have just read, found after the words "State Department," in line 22, and going down to the word "reports" in line 24?

Mr. CULLOM. Perhaps I had better read to the Senator another portion of the Secretary's letter on this subject, which may explain what the Senator desires to have answered.

As the work required is largely of a technical and special character, and analogous in these respects to the work of the office of Naval Records of the Rebellion, I have adopted substantially the language of the appropriation act for that office (see Stat. L., Fifty-third Congress, third session, chapter 177, page 791), in order that persons may be selected "by reason of special aptitude for the work."

The increase in the amount of salaries heretofore paid is $840, this amount being added in order to secure the services of an additional statistician, made requisite by the recent growth in the work of compiling the consular and other commercial reports, and to obtain greater efficiency in the distribution of them.

Mr. GORMAN. Still I ask the Senator the question, if the language I have just read is not for the purpose of taking those employees outside of the civil service and enabling the Secretary of State to appoint them without an examination?

Mr. CULLOM. I think they are already outside of the civil service.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. And that being true, they can not be taken out of it.

Mr. GORMAN. They heretofore have been employed and paid out of a special appropriation——

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. And were not officers of the Government. Now, for the first time by act we are to create these officers. While I am not specially in love with the civil-service rules which have been enacted, the fact is, that under recent orders, and those which we are informed are to come within a day or two, practically everybody in all the Departments of the Government will be required to pass the civil-service examination.

It is not possible to-day to have a man or a woman employed in the Government Printing Office for the purpose of stitching books or the bills which are before us unless he or she has passed a civil-service examination of some sort, and then the appointments are distributed to the States in proportion to population, revolutionizing the whole system of appointments in all the Departments in the most minor and insignificant places. Now, right on the eve, indeed, sir, the morning of the very day of an order going into effect making this system more sweeping in another Department of the Government which, as we are informed, is soon to cover every appointment, here comes from the State Department a proposition to employ a clerk at $1,400, to be the personal appointment of the Secretary of State; that is to say, it is proposed to permit the Secretary of State to appoint him without examination as to his qualifications.

I understand that the merit of the civil-service system is that you get better men because of such examination. Here are three clerks, one at $1,400, one at $1,000, and one at $900, and then a laborer at $660. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that if it is a good rule which we have entered upon, the civil-service examination should apply to all these places. I for one am utterly opposed to this provision for specific appointments outside of the civil service. The duties of these employees are not of a high character. It does not of necessity require any special technical knowledge to perform the duties of a laborer or those of an ordinary clerk in that Department. I would give the Department the employees they desire and make provision for them, if they are necessary, as they would seem to be from the note of the Secretary of State; but I do not believe that to-day, in the light of what is going on around us, orders being issued by the President of the United States to place everybody else under civil-service rules, we ought deliberately to make these places exempt from that rule.

In line 22, page 22, after the word "Department," I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude for the work of compiling and distributing consular and other commercial reports"; so as to leave the offices stand and let them come under the general rule which has been made by the President of the United States.

Mr. CALL. I hope that motion will not prevail. Without discussing the merits of the civil-service law or its demerits, it is pertinent to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland to say that it is unwise to forbid to a high officer of the Government charged with important duties the selection of even a single person for the performance of a special duty and to divest him of the discretion which by law and the Constitution and of necessity invest in him, and to place it in three persons under no kind of responsibility, not charged with investigating the aptitude of the person for that particular duty, not charged with investigating his fitness for a confidential position, but simply with his knowledge of some elementary subjects.

Mr. President, there can be no reason for such a proposition. Why not, according to the argument of the Senator from Maryland, make the Civil Service Commissioners the Secretary of State? That is what he proposes to do. It is proposed to give to those Commissioners the important duties of heads of Departments, because the selection of the officers who are to execute the law is clearly the whole of their duty. The executive department, charged with the execution of the laws, exercises that function by appointing persons fit for the duty. The Constitution says the head of a Department shall have this power vested in him. That is the distribution of power. The executive power of this Government is carefully invested in particular officers charged personally with important duties. What are they? To select and appoint the officers who are to perform them.

However proper it may be to appoint some person as an examiner, to separate that duty from the head of the Department, to make a list of eligibles, there is no reason why we should say that it shall be absolute, and that no person connected with these important duties shall be assigned thereto by the head of a Department; that no discretion shall be vested in the head of a Department, but that the whole power, even to appoint a bootblack or a scrub woman shall be placed in three Civil Service Commissioners who are charged with investigating blindly the scholarly qualifications of individuals.

It may be a good rule to create a list of eligibles under suitable examination, but there is no reason why, when the Secretary of State comes to the Senate and the House and asks for a person to do a particular duty under his immediate eye, we should say he shall have no kind of discretion in the selection of that person, who, on the contrary, shall be taken from the highest upon a list of eligibles.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Florida is making an argument against the civil-service law.

Mr. CALL. Oh, no; against its application to everybody.

Mr. GORMAN. The civil-service law authorizes the President of the United States to place under the civil-service law any number of officers, and all of them, exclusive of those who are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It requires an order from him to do it.

Now, in this case, in the State Department the President of the United States, by the request and with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, has placed every messenger and every watchman and every clerk and consular clerk and now consular agents under that rule. That was their act, not the act of Congress. It was done because they believed it would improve the public service. I accord to them perfect sincerity in all they have done. Now comes a proposition to create three or four places, and the Senate by the amendment proposes to reverse the rule which the Secretary of State and the President of the United States have made, and in these four appointments to take them entirely outside of the civil service.

I am not in favor of the sweeping civil-service rules which have been made; I do not believe that they work well, and I have thought from the beginning that it would come to just what the present Congress is considering, a permanent pension roll for the employees, who, under this rule, are to be kept in office during the time they can perform duty. As I say, I am not in favor of it; but I do say that Congress ought not in this provision to make an exception and to permit this Secretary or any other to make appointments in his Department outside of the civil service when those officers by their own act have placed all the balance of the employees of the Department under that rule, making it impossible for a man to be appointed as a messenger or watchman, positions now provided by law and appropriated for in this very bill, unless he has passed a civil-service examination. If the rule is a good one, as the Secretary thinks, and as the President unquestionably thinks, then apply it to every employee in the Department.

Why except these clerks? It requires no more ability to perform this particular duty, indeed, not half so much, as for a head of a division in that great Department, which is concerned with all the relations between this nation and others. There is no reason for it. There is no reason why Congress should step in and say to the Secretary, "The rule which you have made for all the messengers and clerks in your office is a bad one. We will except these particular cases and permit you to put in your favorites outside of such an examination." It is not wise; it is not proper.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will probably not need to strike out all that he has indicated. If the words in line 22, "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude," are stricken out, it will carry the point.

Mr. GORMAN. I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois. It accomplishes exactly what I want.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say, if the Senator from Maryland has concluded his remarks, that I see very plainly the force of his observation as applicable to the proposed amendment. If everything else is to be under civil-service rules and regulations, I see no special reason why these employees should not be also; but I wish to state that I have not the slightest doubt that the Secretary of State would get a better class of men by leaving those words in than he will probably get by depending upon the Civil Service Commission to furnish them. That is my private judgment about it, publicly expressed. At the same time I recognize the fact that nearly everybody else in the public service is now under civil service or is about to be, if the order has not yet been issued taking in those not included in previous orders. That being the fact, so far as I personally am concerned, I am perfectly willing that those words shall be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. CALL. The proposition of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the opposition of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] involve a very important point outside of the simple question whether a high officer of this Government shall be divested of all kind of power and discretion in regard to the employees who are to execute the law. What the Constitution of the United States says is a complete answer to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland. We are not to make laws because the President has done something or the Secretary of State has done something. We are not to make laws because they have put everybody in the civil service, not leaving a single exception. That is no reason why the Secretary of State should not have the designation of a particular person. Suppose they have done so, and that the Secretary, for reasons satisfactory to himself, wishes to employ a man and to select him, is it any answer to say the public service will be promoted, when the Senator from Illinois admits that he thinks the public service would be promoted by this discretion? Is it any answer to say, "Well, the Secretary of State has agreed to put everybody under the civil service, and why except this?" The question is not what he has done, but what is best for the public interests, what is best for the execution of the law?

The Constitution provides that Congress may create inferior offices to be vested in the head of a Department. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] says under the civil-service law the appointment of these officers shall not be vested in the head of a Department. He says Congress must not exercise that discretion. Why? Because there is a civil-service law which authorizes the President to put everybody over whom he has authority under the civil service and provides that an appointment can only be made in that way after a civil-service examination. But Congress has the power to say to the President, "We will create an inferior office and we will obey the Constitution and put it under the head of a Department, and you can not divest Congress of that power." Now, the Secretary of State comes here and asks Congress to exercise that power. We are told that the President has put everybody, the bootblacks and the scrub women, under the civil service, and the Secretary has agreed to it, and therefore, however important and beneficial it may be, it can not be done. Why not? We are not obliged to follow the President's suggestion, and it is not at all pertinent to the civil service, as a general rule and policy to create a list of eligibles, that this should be done.

What is the condition? They have arbitrary rules which disfranchise and render ineligible to office all the people of the United States over 45 years of age. There are other rules that require them to come up to a particular weight and standard in the mail service; they must weigh so much and have such a height. All the rest of the people of the United States are deprived of their eligibility to hold office under the Government, and Congress is to be bound to exercise no kind of discretion in the matter. We are to have a privileged class created by three Civil Service Commissioners not responsible to the people of the United States, not elected. However meritorious a person may be, however much better qualified for a position, he is to be excluded and Congress is to be prohibited from providing even in reference to a single clerk when asked for by the head of a Department. I desire to protest against it and express my opposition to this wholesale disfranchisement of the people of the United States of their right to hold office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GORMAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida wish to be understood as objecting to it?

Mr. CALL. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the committee. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Department," on page 22, line 22, strike out the words "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude."

Mr. CULLOM. That takes it out of the power of the Secretary of State to make an appointment except by civil-service regulation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to hear the amendment read before we vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

For services of employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, for the work of compiling and distributing consular and other commercial reports, namely, one clerk, at $1,400; one clerk, at $1,000; one clerk, at $900, and one laborer, at $660; in all, $3,960, the same to be paid from the appropriation of $20,000 for preparation, printing, publication, and distribution by the Department of State of the consular and other commercial reports made in the diplomatic and consular appropriation act approved February 27, 1896.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the items for the Treasury Department, on page 26, line 17, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and in line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "sixty thousand nine" and insert "sixty-two thousand five"; so as to make the clause read:

Division of bookkeeping and warrants: For chief of division, $3,500; assistant chief of division, $2,400; estimate and digest clerk, $2,250; two principal bookkeepers, at $2,100 each; ten bookkeepers, at $2,000 each; ten clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 1; one messenger; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $62,570.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 25, before the word "clerks," to strike out "two" and insert "three," and on page 27, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twenty-four thousand eight" and insert "twenty-six thousand four"; so as to make the clause read:

Division of customs: For chief of division, $2,750; assistant chief of division, $2,000; three clerks of class 4; additional to one clerk of class 4, acting as drawback clerk, $200; three clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; two clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; three clerks, at $900 each; and two assistant messengers; in all, $26,490.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 15, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the chief engineer of the Revenue-Cutter Service, detailed as engineer in chief of said service, under the provisions of the legislative appropriation act of July 31, 1894, shall hereafter receive the duty pay and have the relative rank of a captain of the Revenue-Cutter Service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 9, after the word "and," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "one sewer and folder, at $2.50 per day" and insert "two sewers and folders, at $2.50 per day each," and in line 13, before the word "cents," to strike out "thirty thousand four hundred and sixty dollars and ninety" and insert "thirty-one thousand two hundred and forty-three dollars and forty"; so as to make the clause read:

Division of stationery, printing, and blanks: For chief of division, $2,500; four clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; two clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $900 each; two messengers; two assistant messengers; foreman of bindery, at $4 per day; four binders, at $3.20 per day each; and two sewers and folders, at $2.50 per day each; in all, $31,243.40.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McBRIDE. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon submits an amendment to the pending bill, which will be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 31, line 12, after the words "four thousand," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

Office of Comptroller of the Treasury: For Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,500; Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,500.

Mr. PLATT. The committee proposes to make the salary of the Assistant Comptroller $4,500. I do not wish to agree to the amendment. I think that the amount should be larger. I move to amend the amendment so as to increase the salary to $5,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. The salary fixed by law is $5,000.

Mr. PLATT. Yes, and I propose in lieu of the amendment reported by the committee, which is to insert "five hundred" after the words "four thousand," to strike out "four," in line 11, before "thousand," and insert "five."

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the committee will agree to that, because $5,000 is the legal salary.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to state that on the 31st of July, 1894, we passed a public act providing "That there shall also be an Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, to be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum." The other House cut down that salaried office of $5,000 to $4,000. The committee, seeing the injustice of doing that, has added $500, but still leaves it $500 below the statute salary. I do not think that is right, Mr. President, especially when, upon the recommendation of the committee called the Cockrell or Dockery commission, the salary was fixed at $5,000, upon discussion—I do not think that upon an appropriation bill it should be reduced. I wish to say that the committee has not treated this officer as it has treated the private secretary of the President, who has a salary, I believe, of $4,500, and which it reports to make $5,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. Is the present incumbent of the office from Connecticut?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Thank you.

Mr. PLATT. But the first incumbent of the office was from Missouri. Mr. Mansur was the first incumbent of this office, and he had a salary of $5,000. After the death of Mr. Mansur a Connecticut man was appointed, and I want the same justice meted out to him that was meted out to the Missouri man. In other words, I want the amount provided by law to be appropriated. It is perhaps pertinent to state that the Dockery commission put upon two individuals the work which had previously been done by six. The Comptroller and the Assistant Comptroller had all the duties placed upon them which theretofore had been done by six persons. I hope the Committee on Appropriations will not object to making the amount $5,000.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I was very glad to be able to identify from the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut the person to whom the amendment relates. I take this occasion to bear very cheerful testimony to the efficiency and ability of the gentleman referred to and to the fact that he earns the full salary of $5,000, which the Senator from Connecticut suggests be given to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish also to say that although this is a Connecticut gentleman he has spent a great deal of time in his short life, for he is still youthful, out in Colorado and the mountains of the West, and that has aided to make him exceedingly acute, able, and valuable in this office.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It has done more than that. If he spent much time in Colorado he needs a salary of $5,000.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Senate may conclude that when Colorado and Connecticut agree on a proposition it must be right.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this man's salary. The House, after due deliberation and investigation, fixed his salary at $4,000, notwithstanding the statute, which I admit had previously fixed the salary of the office at $5,000. The Senate committee was inclined to think that perhaps there was a little injustice done to this man as compared with those around him and the committee increased it, so far as it was concerned, to $4,500. I think that the Senators who are interested in this young gentleman had better be content with fixing the salary at $4,500, because it is a sort of splitting of the difference between the statute and the House proposition. Besides, it is a very fair salary, and it is within $500 of the amount each of us is entitled to draw as a representative of our respective States.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. Does his committee commit itself or desire to commit the Senate to the policy, when the law fixes a salary, of appropriating only a part of it and sending the officer into the Court of Claims for the rest? It seems to me if the salary is too high there should be a law passed to lower it, and that Congress should not simply refuse to appropriate it. It is just as much a legal obligation on the part of the Government to pay this man $5,000 a year salary, unless we repeal the law, as it is to pay a Goverment bond. I can not understand under what authority the committee consents to appropriating a part of the salary for a year and then letting the man go to the Court of Claims for the rest.

Mr. CULLOM. In answer to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate came to the conclusion that this man's services are not worth any more than $4,500 a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ask the Senator from Illinois whether the bill was not originally reported from the Committee on Appropriations somewhere else with the full amount of $5,000 in it, and after it had been reported and during its consideration was not the reduction made?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; that is true.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is my recollection.

Mr. CULLOM. The report of the committee was voted down.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Illinois says he does not think this man's services are worth more than $4,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I will say the office; I do not care to refer to the man. I do not think the office ought to have more than $4,500.

Mr. PLATT. The office is by law salaried at $5,000 a year. The Comptroller had $5,500, the Assistant Comptroller had $5,000, which is the usual distinction between the principal officer and the assistant officer. If we are going into this business of saying that we will determine how much a man's services are worth, we might take up the Cabinet officers. I think upon that ground it is very possible we might get a vote in the Senate or in the House that we would appropriate for some Cabinet officers only six or seven thousand dollars, instead of $8,000, which is the amount provided by law; and I am not sure but that some of the Cabinet officers, if we should act upon that ground, might get reduced still further than I have suggested. Now, that is very unsafe ground to go upon. Here is the law which makes this salary $5,000. If I had the time to explain the duties of this officer there would be no question, I think, that the office is worth $5,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. The duties of this office should be referred to sufficiently to justify the appropriation of $5,000. I do not think the Senator from Illinois who has charge of the bill wishes to do any injustice to the present incumbent of the office. He disclaims that and expresses his opinion about the office itself. The office itself is that of Deputy Comptroller. When the Comptroller is absent, the deputy performs the functions of the office. Now, what is the office? Senators know very well that under the lead of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] the Treasury Department has been reorganized, and instead of the two Comptrollers we have but one, and this is the assistant of the sole Comptroller of the Treasury. I ask the Senator from Missouri if I am not right?

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. That Comptroller determines absolutely whether a dollar of money shall go out of the Treasury or shall not go out. Senators know very well who the present Comptroller is and the great controversy over the fact that he has refused to pay the sugar bounty. He is supreme within his function. Neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury nor any other officer under the Government can get one dollar out of the Treasury without the signature of the Comptroller of the Treasury. That Comptroller has been deliberately made one man by abolishing the comptroller for the Army and the Navy appropriations, and he has had given to him this assistant, as intelligent and as upright and as able a man as Connecticut ever produced or Colorado ever nurtured.

Mr. President, while I am not in favor of increasing salaries, I do say that we should not undertake to place a stigma upon a man who has been put into that office, a good Democrat, too, and Democrats are having trouble enough nowadays without having a stigma of this kind put upon them. We would put a stigma upon him by selecting him out and reducing his office when there is no general revision of salaries in the bill. If the Senator from Illinois will say that either the House or the Senate committee has undertaken to go all over the salaried offices that are contained in the bill and carry out a measure of economy and reform extending to a dozen or two dozen or a hundred or two hundred offices, I will join with the committee in considering that measure of economy and reform. But the House has done no such thing as that. For some reason or other it has taken out and reduced the salary of the Assistant Comptroller. I ask the Senator from Missouri to tell the Senate before this is voted upon what he thinks as to the importance of the office of Comptroller and Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, which he, by his research and his influence in legislation, has created, what he thinks as to the importance of the office of Comptroller and the office of Assistant Comptroller which this young man holds. I say it is a stigma, it is unjust, and it is unbecoming for Congress to make a reduction in this salary in this way.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from New Hampshire has properly stated the duties of the office. As a matter of course, the office of Comptroller is the most important office really in the Treasury Department, and any assistant necessarily occupies an important position. It is true he can not make final decisions, because they can only be made by the Comptroller, but he must practically decide a great many questions.

Mr. CHILTON. I only want to call attention to one point in connection with this matter. I am not familiar enough with the duties performed by this officer to speak advisedly in regard to his compensation; but if it is the design of this appropriation bill to cut his salary down, the language employed hardly accomplishes the object. The Supreme Court of the United States has had this question before it twice. It was decided in one case that where an officer's compensation is fixed by statute and a subsequent appropriation act provided for a less amount, suit could be maintained to recover the balance from the Government. It was decided in still another case that this rule does not apply if the appropriation act uses language which shows that the appropriation is intended to be full compensation, and act on the matter in place of the statute. So that, unless this appropriation bill uses further language than that which is now under consideration, this party could still recover the balance of his statutory salary.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will allow me to call his attention to the very first paragraph in the bill, which reads:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, for the objects hereinafter expressed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to have the Senator from Texas understand that while the point he makes is entirely correct——

Mr. CHILTON. I am doubtful whether the language employed would be sufficient to effect the object intended.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it were not for that clause, the Senator would be right, and the full salary could be recovered in the Court of Claims; but this method of reducing salaries having been adopted many years ago, this clause has been invented for the purpose of making a reduction of salary, which is a very unfair method, I think, of reducing salaries.

Mr. CHILTON. The language on the first page, just quoted by the Senator from Illinois, conveys the proper idea; but it is barely explicit enough. The case in which the Supreme Court decided that an appropriation act had the effect to repeal the statutory salary used language of much greater particularity. It is somewhat problematical, in my judgment, whether the phraseology of the present bill will be so construed.

Mr. PLATT. I wish once more to call attention to the services which are performed by the Comptroller and Assistant Comptroller as compared with what was performed by the officers who performed the same duties before the law was passed. The law which provided for the appointment of a Comptroller and Assistant Comptroller abolished the offices of commissioner of customs, deputy commissioner of customs, second comptroller, deputy second comptroller, and deputy first comptroller of the Treasury, and put the duties that had been previously performed by those officers upon the Comptroller and Assistant Comptroller. As a matter of practice, while the Second Comptroller is under the Comptroller, he acts independently of him and passes upon all accounts relating to the Army, the Navy, the Indian, and the pension appropriations, taking one-half of the Departments of the Government, while the Comptroller takes the other half, and when the Comptroller is absent he becomes Comptroller. I submit that this is not a case for cutting down a salary.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. I ask if the opinions that are given by the Assistant Comptroller are revised by the Comptroller of the Treasury?

Mr. PLATT. The opinions which are given by the Assistant Comptroller to the heads of the different Departments are not revised by the Comptroller, but pass the same as the opinions given by the Comptroller himself.

Mr. CULLOM. One word. I certainly did not desire to be understood as making any reflection upon the gentleman who holds the office of Assistant Comptroller. I never had the pleasure of his acquaintance and have never seen him. I appreciate the value of the office he holds; but I found on investigation that the other body having charge of the origination of appropriation bills had, after discussion, come to the conclusion that the salary of this office was too high, and reduced it from $5,000 to $4,000. It seems to me, from my knowledge of the office and from talking with gentlemen who know the occupant of the office, that that was certainly not fair. So the Committee on Appropriations reported to increase the amount $500, which is within $500 of what the statute had fixed heretofore.

I have myself no doubt that the occupant of the office is doing his whole duty, and doing it as well as anybody in that position could. I am simply making these remarks so that if I carelessly said anything that might be considered as a reflection upon this official it may be understood that I am not attempting to make any such reflection whatever.

I do believe, however, that there are many of these salaries which have been fixed by statute which are too large; but if the Senate feels that this salary ought to be put back to the amount heretofore fixed by general statute, I have no objection whatever.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make an inquiry, which is, whether the same committee have not revised the action of the House of Representatives in another respect, that is, the salary of the secretary of the Executive, which the other House cut down in the same way, and now the committee propose to give him a salary more than is provided by law?

Mr. CULLOM. The committee propose to give him the exact salary that he has been getting for a number of years.

Mr. PLATT. But it is more than the original statute provided.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know what the original statute did provide.

Mr. PLATT. The other House cut the salary below the statutory salary, and the Senate restored it at a higher rate.

Mr. CULLOM. No higher than the present statute provides. We did that because we all know that the office of private secretary to the President of the United States is a responsible and important one.

Mr. HOAR. That is true, considering who he has on his hands. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOM. Yes. Now I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, line 11, after the word "thousand," the Committee on Appropriations report to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, $4,500.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend that amendment by striking out the word "four" before "thousand" and inserting "five," and after "thousand," by striking out "five hundred," which is the amendment recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, on page 31, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "four" and insert "five," and after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred"; so as to read:

Assistant Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. There seems to be a desire that we should have an executive session this evening, and I am willing that the bill shall be laid aside now, with the understanding that we take it up as early as possible to-morrow morning after the routine morning business.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment to permit me to make a report and ask for action upon it.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

PUGET SOUND AND LAKES UNION AND WASHINGTON WATERWAY.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound at Salmon Bay with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway, to report it without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, as I am sure it will not occasion any debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution be read for information.

The joint resolution was read, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 24, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate March 23, 1896.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 23, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 6576) to amend section 3480 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to loyalty, was referred to the Committee on Claims, but properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs. Without objection, the necessary change will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEASE OF CERTAIN LANDS, ARIZONA.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona.

The bill is now on the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the lands reserved for university purposes, and all of the school land in the Territory of Arizona reserved by law for school purposes, may be leased under such laws and regulations as may be hereafter prescribed by the legislature of said Territory, but until such legislative action the governor, secretary of the Territory, and superintendent of public instruction shall constitute a board for the leasing of said lands under the rules and regulations heretofore prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for the respective purposes for which the said reservations were made, except that it shall not be necessary to submit said leases to the Secretary of the Interor for his approval; and all necessary expenses and costs incurred in the leasing, management, and protection of said lands and leases may be paid out of the proceeds derived from such leases.

And it shall be unlawful to cut, remove, or appropriate in any way any timber growing upon the lands leased under the provisions of this act, and not more than one section of land shall be leased to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and no lease shall be made for a longer period than five years, and all leases shall terminate on the admission of said Territory as a State, and all money received on account of such leases in excess of actual expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the execution thereof shall be placed to the credit of the public school fund of said Territory, and shall not be used for any other than public school purposes: Provided, That the proceeds of leases of university and normal school lands shall be placed to the credit of separate funds for the use of said institutions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arizona if this bill has been referred to and reported by a committee to the House?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I will explain if the House will give consent for a few moments.

There was a bill passed formerly by the House upon this subject which went to the President and was vetoed, but was subsequently passed over the veto by the House and was sent to the Senate. In the Senate they decided, under the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior, to redraw the bill rather than pass the original bill over the veto, the new bill being prepared to meet the objections which had been interposed in the President's veto.

The present bill is the modified form, modified in accordance with the suggestions of Secretary Smith and in view of the objection made by the President. It passed unanimously, and is now upon the Speaker's table awaiting the action of the House.

Mr. TALBERT. Has it been referred to any committee of the House?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. The committee have not had the bill directly under consideration, but all of the members have knowledge of the bill. They are all here and make no objection to its consideration as it stands.

Mr. TALBERT. But they make no report?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. Not on this bill; but, as I have said, on a bill of a similar character they did report, and the bill passed the House.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, if we can have the attention of the House for a few moments, I think there will be no objection to the present consideration and passage of the bill in question.

The bill, as the House will remember, on the same subject was passed over the veto of the President some days ago. After consideration of the matter in the Senate Committee on Public Lands, it was deemed best, under all of the circumstances, instead of passing the House bill, to pass a bill with an amendment substantially removing the main objection made by the President in his veto. The original bill would not have met the approval of the House Committee on the Public Lands if the committee had deemed it subject to the objection embodied in the President's veto. But they did not think it could possibly result in the destruction of timber on the leased lands, or that the objection made would have any validity. But the bill as it now comes to the committee has a proviso that no timber lands shall be leased, or rather

I should say it contains a provision for the ample protection of the timber lands, at any rate.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Is not the gentleman mistaken about that?

Mr. LACEY. I say that there is a provision for the protection of the timber lands.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The gentleman stated that it was provided in the bill that no timber lands should be leased.

Mr. LACEY. That was an incorrect statement which I corrected immediately afterwards. The provision is that there shall be no cutting of the timber.

As I understand it, some of these timber lands are excellent grazing lands, and very desirable for leases on that account; but the bill provides that it shall be unlawful to cut, remove, appropriate, or in any way interfere with the timber on the lands. The bill also limits the amount of land which may be leased to any one person, corporation, etc., to one section.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. If the gentleman will pardon me. Suppose the lands leased are altogether timber lands, to what use can they be subjected unless the timber is removed?

Mr. LACEY. They can be used for grazing purposes. As I have just said, I understand that in some parts there are portions of the timber lands where grass grows suitable for grazing purposes, and the lands are available for leasing for that purpose.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. What remedy is there for depredating upon the timber?

Mr. LACEY. By the general law there is ample protection already in that regard. But the provision of the pending bill does not give to the lessees any right to cut the timber.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Would depredations on the timber void the lease?

Mr. LACEY. Not necessarily, in my opinion——

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Ought not that to be the case?

Mr. LACEY. But the man who cuts the timber would be sent to the penitentiary. It is a penitentiary offense, and he is also subjected to a heavy fine; so I think there is ample protection in this regard.

The only difficulty in connection with the matter, I ought to say, was this: Whether or not the manner in which the first bill was drawn would confer upon the lessees a right, without being subject to penalties, to cut the timber; and that, in the opinion of the committee, has been effectually removed by the bill in its present form.

I also call your attention to the following statement of Secretary Smith in regard to the bill. He says:

If this bill were amended so as to exclude the leasing of timber land or prohibit the cutting of timber on leased timber land, and also limit the quantity which could be leased to any one concerned and the duration of the lease, its objectionable features would be eliminated.

An attempt has been made to carry out every suggestion made by the Secretary, and there is no desire on the part of anyone to allow the leases to culminate in the cutting of the timber. I do not think myself that the original bill could possibly have been used to accomplish that purpose; that is to say, that under its provisions the timber could not have been cut either; but we will forego that point and make it absolutely certain by the adoption of the bill in its present form.

I think there was no question under the former bill and that the provisions as to timber were not necessary, but there can be no objection to inserting them.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. My friend from Iowa will remember that on a former occasion, when the House was considering the veto message of the President, it appeared that the President objected to the bill because it provided that these leases should not be submitted to the Secretary. On examining this bill I find that that provision still remains in it.

Mr. LACEY. Yes.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Why would it not be well to strike that out?

Mr. LACEY. Because the Secretary did not want it stricken out, and because that really was not the objectionable feature of the bill.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Does that appear in the letter that you hold in your hand?

Mr. LACEY. Here is what the Secretary says:

House bill 2769 was not referred before its passage by the House and Senate to this Department for consideration. When the bill came here from the President, in the short time allowed for report, all that was done by the Department was to see that the bill complied substantially with the Oklahoma law. No opportunity was afforded to consider the question as to whether reasons existed for a different rule in Arizona from that which was working satisfactorily in Oklahoma.

That explains why he sent the former bill to the President with the departmental approval.

He further says:

Since that time the attention of the Department has been called by numerous communications from Arizona and by an investigation of the facts to the heavily timbered condition of a considerable portion of the school lands in Arizona. It would be undoubtedly a mistake to allow this timbered land leased and the timber cut from it. If the bill were changed so that it would go into effect only after the legislature of Arizona had an opportunity to make regulations controlling the leasing of the lands, there would be no serious objection to it. On the other hand, if the bill were amended so as to exclude the leasing of timber land or prohibit the cutting of timber on leased timber land, and also limit the quantity which could be leased to any one concern and the duration of the lease, its objectionable features would be eliminated.

The protests from Arizona come from a great variety of people, Democrats and Republicans, and men who (many of them from my own knowledge) must be moved entirely by a desire for the good of the Territory. In view of these facts, I do not think it safe for the bill in its present form to become a law. Had the bill, before its passage, been referred to this Department, I have no doubt that investigation would have suggested in advance these modifications.

I inclose herewith copy of a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated the 5th instant, on this subject, to which I respectfully invite your attention; also to the letter from the chief of the drafting division of the General Land Office.

Very respectfully, HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Now, the Senate Committee on Public Lands have attempted to comply fully with what they understand to be the wishes of the Secretary of the Interior, and, as I am informed, they do not understand that the departmental approval of the leases is desired by the Secretary of the Interior; and although the message in terms referred to that as an objection, that was referred to incidentally and without the knowledge on the part of the President that a different provision had been inserted in the Oklahoma bill at the request of the Department of the Interior. This bill, as I understand, will meet all the objections of the Interior Department to the former bill.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Are the safeguards provided in this bill for the protection of the timber known to the Secretary and approved by him? Has the draft of the bill on this subject been submitted to him?

Mr. LACEY. I can not say as to that. This bill in its present form originated in the Senate.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. It would be more satisfactory to me if the bill had prohibited the leasing of the timber lands.

Mr. LACEY. That was a subject of conference with the Delegate from that Territory, and he informs me that there is a very large area of that land that is good grazing land, but is covered also with timber, and there would be a considerable loss of revenue if the leasing of the timber land was entirely done away with.

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. I can explain that. The University of Arizona had these 72 sections reserved for it, and every acre of the land is good for summer grazing. There is no underbrush among the trees, and it is good grazing land. Unless it can be leased for grazing purposes there will be no income to the university, and the university desires something from these lands. It would utterly eliminate any income from these lands if they could not be leased at all simply because there is timber upon them. Every acre of these lands is good for summer grazing.

Mr. BOWERS. There is nothing in the bill that allows the cutting of timber?

Mr. MURPHY of Arizona. No; we are as anxious to prohibit the cutting of timber as anybody.

I think no one has any objection to the bill, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS CORPUS CHRISTI CHANNEL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3549) authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex.

The bill was read. It provides that the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Texas, is authorized and empowered to erect, construct, maintain, and operate a bridge over and across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains on and over a double or single track, as said Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company may elect, etc.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the information of the House that this bill was introduced by my late colleague, Mr. Crain. The Committee on Commerce referred it to the Secretary of War, and the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War have reported favorably upon the bill. It has been unanimously reported by the committee. If the House desires, I will have the report read, but it is substantially as I have stated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills and joint resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

The bill (S. 1975) granting a pension to Mrs. Julia Jones Duncan, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Samuel A. Duncan—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5286) providing for disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath hay reservation not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4463) to grant two condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth Separate Company National Guard of State of New York; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2482) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to loan two condemned cannon to the Confederate Home of Missouri, located at Higginsville, Lafayette County, Mo.;

A bill (S. 2187) to pension Thomas F. Leahy;

A bill (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company;

A bill (S. 314) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler; and

A bill (S. 177) granting an increase of pension to Sophia D. Clendenin.

FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to present the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish this House at an early date the following information in regard to the salaries of fourth-class postmasters, to wit:

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries are $50 per annum or less, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed fifty and are not above one hundred dollars per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed one hundred and are not above two hundred dollars per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed two hundred and are not above five hundred dollars per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed five hundred and are not above nine hundred and ninety-nine dollars per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads report that they have considered this resolution, and report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman the object of the resolution—if it looks to an increase of the pay of fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman that the object sought to be attained here, I believe, is that the House may know the salaries received by the different grades of the fourth-class postmasters. Possibly the ultimate object is to pay a salary to fourth-class postmasters, if I understand the object. The gentleman from Louisiana introduced the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LOUD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SAFETY OF EMPLOYEES AND TRAVELERS.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes, and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893, be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 6. That any such common carrier using any locomotive engine, running any train, or hauling or permitting to be hauled or used on its line any car in violation of any of the provisions of this act, shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every such violation, to be recovered in a suit or suits to be brought by the United States district attorney in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction in the locality where such violation shall have been committed; and it shall be the duty of such district attorney to bring such suits upon duly verified information being lodged with him of such violation having occurred; and it shall also be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to lodge with the proper district attorneys information of any such violations as may come to its knowledge: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall apply to trains composed of four-wheel cars or to trains composed of eight-wheel standard logging cars where the height of such car from top of rail to center of coupling does not exceed 25 inches, or to locomotives used in hauling such trains.

The amendment recommended by the committee is as follows:

In line 29, after the word "trains," insert the following: "when such cars or locomotives are exclusively used for the transportation of logs."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

QUAY AND DOCK CHARGES ON FLOUR IN LONDON.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is represented that American flour exported to London, England, is subjected to severe and unjust discrimination in quay and dock charges imposed and burdensome regulations as to the time flour cargoes may remain on quays and docks: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be instructed to inquire into the truth of the above representations, and if found to be true to report to this House what legislation, if any, is necessary to relieve American flour from such discriminations and burdens.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CRISP. Has the resolution been reported by a committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. HOPKINS. Ought not the resolution to go to the Committee on Ways and Means, instead of the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had an impression that the subject was under consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir. I move an amendment to that, to substitute the Committee on Ways and Means for the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why should that be done?

Mr. HOPKINS. For the very reason that a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means is at present investigating that very subject, and has had a number of gentlemen interested in the manufacture and export of flour before the committee. This House has already appropriated $1,500 for that investigation, which is now being carried on by the subcommittee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. If objection is made the resolution can not be presented in this way.

Mr. CRISP. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOPKINS. If this resolution should be adopted or referred, I desire that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CRISP. The question I desire to ask is, whether this should be considered until some committee of the House shall have recommended its adoption?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think not. I think the better course would be to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to reference to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand the subject is being inquired into by that committee, as stated by the gentleman.

Mr. HOPKINS. It is.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is no reason why there should be two investigations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to reference of the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means, and it will be so referred.

WAGON AND MOTOR BRIDGE OVER THE MISSOURI RIVER AT ST. CHARLES, MO.

Mr. TRELOAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5675) authorizing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Theodore Bruere, Henry B. Denker, A. F. Mispagel, O. J. Marten, C. W. Prosser, W. F. Bloebaum, B. L. Emmons, L. Ringe, A. Runge, J. F. Rauch, and Henry F. Pieper are hereby authorized to construct and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, between the city of St. Charles, Mo., and St. Louis County, Mo., at a point, at least one-third of a mile from any other bridge, to be selected consistent with the interests of river navigation. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, street-railway cars, motor cars, animals, foot passengers, and for all road travel, for such reasonable rates of toll and under such reasonable rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the said parties and to be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the said parties, or their successors and assigns, shall build and maintain at all times, as accessory works to said bridge, such booms, piers, dikes, guard fences, and similar devices as may be necessary, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, to insure at all times a permanent channel for sufficient distance above and below the bridge site, and for the guiding of rafts, steamboats, and other water craft safely under said bridge: Provided further, That the said parties, or their successors and assigns, shall maintain on said bridge, from sunset to sunrise, such lights and other signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

SEC. 2. That said bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plan and specifications for its construction have been submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval, nor until he shall approve the plan and location of said bridge and accessory works; and if any change be made in the plan of construction of said bridge and accessory works at any time, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and any change in the construction or any alteration of said bridge and accessory works that may be directed at any time by Congress or the Secretary of War, shall be made at the cost and expense of the said parties or their successors and assigns; that the said bridge shall be constructed without interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted, and in order to secure that object the said parties, or their successors and assigns, shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of said bridge and accessory works and a map of the proposed location, giving for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below such proposed location the topography of the banks of the river, with shore lines and soundings, and such other information as may be required for a full understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the construction of said bridge shall not be commenced.

SEC. 3. That said bridge shall be built as a high bridge with an unbroken and continuous span, all spans over the waterway to have a clear channel of not less than 400 feet and a clear headroom of not less than 55 feet above high-water mark; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river and the bridge itself at right angles thereto.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving such plan and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge so built will conform to the requirements of this act, to notify the parties authorized to build the same that he approves of the same, and upon receiving such notification the said parties may proceed to erect said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location, and should any change be made in the plan of the bridge or accessory works during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be likewise submitted for the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which, also, no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the street railways or public highways leading to the said bridge, and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads in the United States, and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal-telegraph purposes.

SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date thereon.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage; and the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

On page 1, after the word "point," in line 9, strike out the rest of the line.

On page 2, section 2, after the word "the," in line 2, insert the words "location and"; and after the word "plans," in line 2, strike out the rest of the line, excepting the last two words. In line 3 strike out the words "submitted to" and insert the words "approved by." In the third line, after the word "war," strike out the rest of the line and insert the words "as hereinafter provided for." Strike out all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7, and the first two words in line 8.

On page 3 strike out all after the word "river," in line 14, and all but the last two words of line 15. In line 22 insert, after the word "surroundings," the words "and direction of current at medium high rates." After the first word in line 24 strike out the balance of the section, and add the following, viz:

"Said map and drawings shall be referred to a board of officers of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for examination and report, which board shall personally examine the site of the proposed bridge and shall hold a public session at some convenient point to hear all objections thereto, of which public session due notice shall be given by public advertisement; and if said board of engineers reports that the location selected or the plans presented are unfavorable to the interests of navigation the Secretary of War is authorized, upon the recommendation of said board, to require such changes in location or plans as may be deemed necessary to protect the interests of navigation; and said bridge shall not be constructed except in accordance with the plans recommended by said board and approved by the Secretary of War."

On page 3 strike out all of section 3 and insert the following in lieu thereof, so that section 3 shall read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That said bridge shall be built as a high bridge with unbroken and continuous spans, at least three of the spans over the waterway to give a clear channel width of not less than 400 feet at low-water surface and clear headroom of not less than 55 feet above high-water surface; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current as near as possible at high stages of the river."

On page 3, section 4, strike out all after the word "receiving," in the second line, and insert the words "the report of the Board of Engineers." In line 3, section 4, substitute "the" for "a," between the words "that" and "bridge," and after the word "bridge," in the third line, strike out the word "so" and insert the words "to be."

On page 4, section 4, line 8, strike out the words "be made," and in line 9, after the word "works," insert the words "become desirable." After the word "shall," in line 10, strike out the balance of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Only be authorized when recommended by a board of engineer officers and approved by the Secretary of War." In line 4, page 4, section 6, strike out the word "thereon" and insert the word "hereof."

On page 5, section 7, strike out all of line 1 after the word "that" and the first six words in line 2, so that the section as amended shall read: "That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 12,000 additional copies of the report of the Board of Engineers relative to the construction and completion of the Nicaragua Canal, without maps, of which 4,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Also:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 17, of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, being the memorial of the National Woolgrowers' Association; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the concurrent resolution of the Senate in regard to the "insurrection in Cuba," had insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CALUMET RIVER.

Mr. ALDRICH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 2251, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River. I have been instructed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report the bill favorably and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Hammond and Blue Island Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Illinois, or its successors and assigns, to construct and maintain, under such conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, a bridge and approaches thereto across the Calumet River, in Cook County, in the State of Illinois, at a point on and opposite lot 6 in Snydacker & Ambs's Illinois addition to Hammond, in section 8, township 36 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian; and provides that said bridge may be constructed for railway and postal service, with single and double track for railway traffic.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALDRICH of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GEORGE I. SPANGLER.

Mr. STAHLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4424) to correct the military record of George I. Spangler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of George I. Spangler, late lieutenant of Company K, Two hundredth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, in the late civil war, and grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STAHLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RICHARD W. JOHNSON.

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5478) for the relief of Richard W. Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department are hereby authorized and directed, upon application being made by Richard W. Johnson for commutation of rations and of pay which accrued while the said Richard W. Johnson was in the Volunteer and Regular Armies of the United States, to pay said Richard W. Johnson, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum found to be due him by the Paymaster-General of the Army under the principles of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Watson case and other decisions relating to longevity pay of army and navy officers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. This being District day under the rules, I call up the business of the District of Columbia, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 227) requiring bills of sale, conditional sales, mortgages, or deeds of trust of chattels in the District of Columbia to be recorded.

BILLS OF SALE, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the District of Columbia no bill of sale, conditional sale, mortgage, deed of trust, or any conveyance, in whole or in part, of personal property or chattels, through or by which title is claimed to, or a lien or claim is retained or created in, such personal property or chattels, shall be good or valid against a subsequent innocent purchaser for value unless such bill of sale, conditional sale, mortgage, deed of trust, or other writing has been duly recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds in said District prior to the sale to such innocent purchaser.

Amendments recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia were read, as follows:

Line 5, after the word "chattels," insert "where the property has not been delivered."

Line 9, after the word "value," insert "and without notice."

Line 11, after the word "recorded," insert "delivered for record."

Line 13, after the word "purchaser," add "and all such instruments shall take effect and be valid from the time when such instruments shall have been delivered to the recorder for record, and the recorder shall indorse on each instrument aforesaid the exact time and hour of delivery of the same to him to be recorded."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JAMES LINSKEY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 1861) for the relief of James Linskey from the operation of the act restricting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased by and conveyed to James Linskey, of said District, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from the operation of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," approved March 3, 1887; and all forfeitures incurred by force of said act are, in respect of such real estate, hereby remitted.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the report on that bill, and I would also like to know why it is that this foreigner should be exempted from the operation of the general law.

Mr. HULICK. The facts of the case are set out quite fully in the report, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The report (by Mr. HULICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. 1861) for the relief of James Linskey, report the same to the House with favorable recommendation.

The facts in this case are set forth in the following petition:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of James Linskey, a citizen of the United States and a resident of the District of Columbia, represents:

That he has been a resident of said District for the last thirty years; that he was born in County Mayo, Ireland, in the year 1840, and came to the United States in the year 1863; and that in 1867 he was married to one Jane Kain, in the District of Columbia; that upon his arrival in this country he immediately established himself in business, and is now engaged in the business of painting, with his son, at 814 Nineteenth street NW.

Petitioner further states that since he came to this country it has never been his intention to retain his allegiance to any other Government, and it has always been his bona fide intention to remain a citizen of the United States and to make his home here in the city of Washington; and to that end, in the month of August, 1889, he purchased a house and lot, in which he now resides, No. 2816 N street NW., being lot 4, square 43, in Alexander Shepherd's subdivision in Georgetown, now West Washington, D. C. At the time he purchased said house and lot for his home he did not know of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens, etc.," (24 Stat., 476), and it was not until the year 1893, when he was summoned on a jury and interrogated by the court, that he was advised of the disability that existed; whereupon petitioner at once took steps to become a citizen, and in the month of May, 1894, he declared his intention of being naturalized as a citizen of the United States in the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Petitioner further states that at the time he purchased said house in 1889 he, in good faith, executed and gave a mortgage or deed of trust to secure the deferred payments on the purchase price, and now, as the title of your petitioner to the real estate aforesaid is clouded by reason of the act of Congress herein referred to, he prays that said real estate, which may be forfeited under the provisions of said act, be relieved and excepted from the operation thereof, and for that purpose that the annexed act be passed.

Petitioner is a poor man, and if the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, are enforced against him it would be a great hardship to him, as he purchased his house in good faith for a home for himself and family.

JAMES LINSKEY.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia recommend favorable action upon the bill. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the law prohibiting aliens from holding real estate in the District of Columbia or in the Territories preclude those who duly declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States?

Mr. HULICK. I presume not, though I can not answer definitely on that point.

Mr. HOPKINS. If it does not, I see no reason why this bill should be passed. The report shows that this man has lived here for thirty years and enjoyed all the benefits of free government without any of the inconveniences of American citizenship.

Mr. HULICK. I will state the facts of the case, and I think they will satisfy the gentleman from Illinois that this bill should be passed. This man has been living here about thirty years. In 1876 he married in this District, and since that time he and his son have been engaged here in the business of painting. In 1889 he purchased this property, the title of which will be placed in jeopardy if this bill is not passed. He resides on the property. He was not aware, as he sets out in his petition, of the existence of the law until 1893, when he was called to sit as a juror, and he then learned that he was not legally the owner of real estate.

Mr. HOPKINS. As a matter of fact, when he was called as a juror did not he raise the point that he could not be compelled to serve as a juror because he was a foreigner?

Mr. HULICK. I am not advised, nor is the committee advised, whether he raised that question, or whether the attorneys in the case raised it. It was, however, determined at that time that he was not qualified to sit as a juror.

Mr. HOPKINS. What excuse does he give for living in this country and enjoying the benefits of our free institutions for thirty years without ever attempting to become a citizen?

Mr. HULICK. He alleges that it was never his intention to bear allegiance to any other Government, and he filed his application for citizenship in 1894.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does he give any reason why he did not years ago make application to become an American citizen?

Mr. HULICK. The gentleman will remember that this man was a citizen of the District of Columbia, where the right of suffrage is not enjoyed and where people are not called upon to qualify themselves for it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Ah, but the right of suffrage did exist here. There was a time since this man was a citizen of the District when the right of suffrage was enjoyed here, when the District had representation in Congress and the people here had the right to vote.

Mr. HULICK. I believe my friend is right about that; but here is this man, a good citizen, who owns this property——

Mr. HOPKINS. But is he a good citizen if he has lived here that length of time without ever attempting to become a real American citizen until he found out that it was necessary to do so in order to protect his interests?

Mr. HULICK. All questions as to this man's character as a citizen and his relations to this Government were presented to the committee in a way which impressed them favorably. If the gentleman from Illinois questions the man's intention and his character and qualifications simply because he failed to make application for citizenship years ago, of course that is a matter for the gentleman himself.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman has stated that this man has now made application to become a citizen?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understood the gentleman also to say that becoming a citizen will, under the terms of the law, relieve him from the penalties that have been incurred.

Mr. HULICK. I do not understand that if he becomes a citizen his title to this real estate is thereby cured. He is a foreigner to all intents and purposes so far as the title to this real estate is concerned. Under the statute the title could not lawfully vest in him. He purchased this property some years ago and has lived there, performing the part of an honest, industrious citizen. He made the purchase in good faith. He is a poor man. At the time of the purchase he executed a mortgage, and his disability as a foreigner affects not only his title, but also the title of the mortgagee.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to put another question to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK], who, I understand, is an able lawyer. If under the provisions of the law of 1887 a foreigner can not acquire title to real estate in the District of Columbia or any of the Territories, then how will this bill relieve this man from any of the inconveniences referred to in the report? In other words, will not the attempt to convey title to him be void?

Mr. HULICK. The object of this bill, as expressly stated in the bill, is this:

And all forfeitures incurred by force of said act are in respect of such real estate hereby remitted.

The gentleman will see there is a special provision remitting any of these forfeitures bearing upon the title to this property.

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the value of the property?

Mr. HULICK. I can not tell. It is the home in which this man lives. He and his son are engaged in the business of painting in this city.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is the gentleman satisfied that it is this man's fixed purpose now to become a citizen?

Mr. HULICK. We have no doubt about it at all. The committee has reported the bill favorably; and it is also indorsed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. We have heard evidence, and we know no reason, legal or otherwise, why the bill should not become a law. In fact, the bill does nothing more than an act of justice.

Mr. LITTLE. How much property is involved in the bill?

Mr. HULICK. There is a house and lot.

Mr. LITTLE. A residence?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir. It is used only as a residence. This man bought it in good faith in 1889 and executed a mortgage on it. Since that time he and his son have been engaged in the business of painting, trying to make an honest living, trying to raise the funds with which to pay off the mortgage. When he was advised that he could not hold title to real estate in this District and that his property was jeopardized, he made application in 1894 to become a citizen, and in May, 1896, he will be entitled to citizenship.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the evidence show that that was the first evidence he had of the existence of the law?

Mr. HULICK. The evidence shows that he knew nothing about the bearing of this statute upon the title of his property until he was called as a juror, and in consequence of the facts which were developed in the investigation of his qualification as a juror he was advised that the title to his property was in question; that, in fact, he did not own it under the law of 1887.

Mr. HEPBURN. A remark made a moment ago by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] would seem to indicate that this bill is really in the interest of the mortgagee.

Mr. HULICK. Not wholly; both the mortgagee and the mortgagor desire to have the title perfected.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it not the mortgagee alone who is now moving in this matter?

Mr. HULICK. Not at all. The committee does not know who the mortgagee is. All that we were advised of was that this man had executed a mortgage to secure a part of the purchase money which he had agreed to pay for the property. We do not know who the mortgagee is.

Mr. GROUT. Will the gentleman state the amount of the mortgage as compared with the value of the property?

Mr. HULICK. No evidence was produced before the committee as to the proportion of purchase money represented by the mortgage and the amount still remaining due.

Mr. BABCOCK. Let me say to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] that the question as to the value of the property and the amount of the mortgage was not necessarily considered by the committee. This property, which is this man's home, is No. 2816 N street. He practically has no title to it. This House has passed a bill of precisely similar character to this in a case attended by similar circumstances, and this same bill was passed in this House in the last Congress, but it failed to pass the Senate because of lack of time. The committee has no doubt as to the propriety of the passage of the bill. I call for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STANDARD SIZE OF DRY MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6833) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall not be lawful for any person, under a penalty of $2 for each offense, to be recovered in the police court of the District of Columbia, in the name of said District, in the same manner as other fines and penalties are recovered, to use any bushel, half-bushel, peck, half-peck, or quarter-peck measure unless the same be of the dimensions following, to be measured from inside to inside, to wit: Every bushel measure shall not be less than 15½ inches in diameter at the top, 14½ inches in diameter at the bottom, 12½ inches deep, and the staves three-fourths of an inch in thickness. Every half-bushel measure shall not be less than 12½ inches in diameter at the top, 11½ inches in diameter at the bottom, 9½ inches deep, and the staves at least 1 inch thick. Every peck measure shall not be less than 10 inches in diameter at the top, 9½ inches in diameter at the bottom, 7½ inches deep, and the staves three-fourths of an inch in thickness. Every half-peck measure, when joined to the peck, shall not be less than 8½ inches in diameter at the top, 9½ inches in diameter at the bottom, 4½ inches in depth, and the staves five-eighths inch thick; and every one-half peck measure, when made separate from the peck, shall not be less than 9½ inches in diameter at the top, 8½ inches in diameter at the bottom, 4½ inches deep, and the staves five-eighths inch thick. Every quarter-peck measure shall not be less than 6½ inches in diameter at the top, 5½ inches in diameter at the bottom, 4½ inches deep, and the staves one-half inch in thickness.

SEC. 2. That the lawful weight of a bushel of potatoes shall be 56 pounds, and that hereafter all sales thereof shall be made by weight.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS of Iowa) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6833) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having fully considered the same, report it to the House with the following amendments, and as so amended recommend that the bill do pass:

In line 4 of section 1 strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

At the end of section 2, and as part thereof, insert the following: "Any violation of this section shall be subject to the same penalty as that provided for in section 1."

A draft of the bill was submitted by the Commissioners of the District on February 29, 1896:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, February 29, 1896.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to recommend the introduction in the House of the inclosed draft of "A bill defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

Very respectfully,
JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

There is at present no law in the District of Columbia by which the shape and size of dry measures are regulated or defined. The measures conform to no standard, and frauds are of daily occurrence in the markets, amounting in the aggregate to a large sum. The proposed law is for the protection of buyers against the sharp practices of dishonest dealers.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will give us some statement as to the purpose of this bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the committee has endeavored to state definitely the reasons for the passage of this bill and the necessity for the legislation proposed in the report which has been read.

The dry measures in the District of Columbia do not conform to any standard size; and the committee was informed that fraud was of daily occurrence. The bill is suggested for the protection of the honest dealers against frauds which have frequently occurred within the District, there being no law now in the District whatever by which the shape and size of the dry measures in use shall be regulated. Therefore, this bill may be said to be for the protection of all buyers and also for the protection of all honest dealers.

The bill was suggested by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. It was carefully considered by the committee, and is recommended unanimously for passage at this time.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to ask him a question. I notice that the bill provides for the size of the several dry measures, defining that they shall not be less than so and so in size. What provision has the committee made to prevent the local dealers from having measures of a larger size to use in purchasing from the countryman—the producer?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Well, the committee thought it unnecessary to guard against a contingency of that sort, which is not likely to arise. The bill provides, the gentleman will observe, for the minimum measures——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. It provides for the minimum measure, and is all right as between the merchant or market man and the local grocery man and the consumer or boarding-house keeper or citizen of the District of Columbia. But what will prevent such dealer from having another measure of a larger size, one exceeding the limits fixed by this bill, from which to buy from the countryman who comes in, and thus commit a fraud against him?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that in the event of the passage of this bill it is presumed that the seller and buyer would be each fully informed as to the conditions of the act.

There are some committee amendments on which I ask a vote.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 2, section 2, page 2 of the bill, by striking out the words "fifty-six" and inserting "sixty."

The purpose of the amendment is this: The dealers in the District of Columbia always buy potatoes at 60 pounds to the bushel and retail them at 56 pounds to the bushel. This simply cures that, and requires them to retail them at the same weight at which they purchased.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I think there will be no objection on the part of the committee to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SEALERS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That section 9 of the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended, so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That no person shall use for buying or selling, or for weighing freight or express matter, any weights, measures, scales, or other instruments, unless the same shall have been examined and approved by the sealer or assistant sealer of weights and measures. The fact and the date of such examination and approval and the period for which such examination and approval shall hold good shall be certified to with the seal of the sealer of weights and measures. Such certificates shall be attached in a conspicuous place to the weights, measures, scales, or other instruments so examined and approved, and such certificate shall be valid only for such time as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall provide in the schedule of fees hereinafter provided for: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent at any time the examination and condemnation of any weights, measures, scales, or other instruments that may be found defective. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prescribe the amount of tolerance to be allowed by the sealer of weights and measures, and all weights, measures, and balances that do not conform to the standards for weights and measures in this act provided for within the limit of tolerance so allowed may be seized by the sealer of weights and measures, and when so seized shall be destroyed by him, and a record of the same shall be duly entered on the books of his office. Failure to comply with the provisions of this section, or the use of any weights, measures, scales, or other instruments described in this section, before the payment of the fees fixed by the said Commissioners for examinations, shall render the person so failing or using liable to a fine of not more than $20 and costs of prosecution for each offense, to be recovered in the police court of the District of Columbia; and the said court may make a further sentence that the offender be imprisoned in the District jail for any period not exceeding six months until the payment of such fine and costs."

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia have considered the bill (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," and report same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The reasons for this measure are correctly set forth in the Senate report on said bill, which is hereto attached and made a part of this report:

[Senate Report No. 231, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," after a full consideration, make a favorable report thereon.

Section 4 of the act in question directs the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to adopt a schedule of fees to be collected by the sealer of weights and measures for his services in making examinations the object being to make the office self-supporting.

Section 9, as it now stands, requires all scales and measures to be stamped once, but does not provide for future examinations.

The courts having decided that no penalty attaches to a failure to pay the fees prescribed, and that one examination does not prevent a subsequent tampering with the weights and measures, the bill remedies these two defects by prescribing a penalty for failure to pay the fees, and also gives the sealer power to make examinations whenever he sees fit.

Since the introduction of the bill two other defects have been found in the law. There is no provision for seizing weights and measures condemned, and hence no way of preventing the reuse of false weights. The sealer of weights and measures stated to the committee that hucksters on the streets are accustomed to watch for his appearance and to hide their false weights and measures when he comes in sight, so as to use them again when he disappears. An amendment prepared by the committee aims to prevent this class of frauds by providing that the sealer of weights and measures may seize and destroy false measures and weights.

Again, it has been decided by the law officers that cases arising under the law as it now stands must be brought before the United States courts, whereas, obviously, they belong to the District courts. An amendment covers this point also.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced to amend an act passed last year, and the intention is simply to make that law operative and cure the defects that experience has found to exist in it.

This question of weights and measures is one that for years the Commissioners have considered and struggled with in the District, and the committee proposed at the last session the bill to which I have already referred, which was passed, and thought it would cure the evil known at that time to exist. Actual experience, however, has demonstrated that the amendment which this bill proposes is necessary.

It is recommended by the sealer of weights and measures, by the Commissioners, and by all interested, except those who use false weights and measures. The statements in the report are so full that I think it unnecessary to detain the House longer by any further discussion of the matter, and I ask a vote.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

KATE WINTER.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad in the District of Columbia,'" approved January 19, 1891, so far as the same authorized the acquisition by said railroad of land for the business of said company in square No. 739 in the city of Washington and District of Columbia be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the report of the committee be read.

The report (by Mr. CURTIS of Iowa) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6981) for the relief of Kate Winter, having considered the same, substitute therefor Senate bill 789, which passed the Senate of the United States March 5, 1896, and recommend that it do pass.

By act approved January 19, 1891, Congress gave to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company the right to acquire square 739 in the city of Washington by condemnation. The company has not chosen to exercise this right and evidently does not intend, at least in the near future, to do so. In the meantime, Miss Winter's title is under a cloud, which renders the property valueless to her.

The Commissioners of the District recommend favorable action.

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 10, 1896.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners recommend favorable action on House bill 6981, for the relief of Kate Winter, which was referred to them at your instance for their examination and report. The object of this bill is to quiet Mrs. Winter's title to the land referred to in the bill by repealing the right of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to take her land by condemnation proceedings. Said company was authorized to acquire land for its business within certain limits specified in the act to authorize the construction of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad in the District of Columbia approved January 19, 1891, and square 739 is within those limits.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, that is all the business which the District Committee desires to present to-day.

COMMISSIONS OF OFFICERS IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in the several Departments.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CROWTHER. I object.

INTRODUCTION OF A RESOLUTION.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that it be referred?

Mr. WALSH. To the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to present it to the House. It should take the usual course.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted. The bill is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder or of rape under sections 5339 or 5345, Revised Statutes, the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto "without capital punishment"; and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life.

SEC. 2. That except offenses mentioned in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, when a person is convicted of any offense to which the punishment of death is now specifically affixed by the laws of the United States, he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment of death, or a lesser punishment, in the discretion of the court, is affixed, the maximum punishment shall be imprisonment at hard labor for life.

SEC. 3. That the punishment of death prescribed for any offense specified by the statutes of the United States, except in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, is hereby abolished, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall apply to or in any way affect any proceeding or indictment now found or pending or that may be found for any offense committed before the passage of this act, and all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be punished under the laws then in force: Provided, That juries may return qualified verdicts in such cases according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, and the sentences shall be imposed as therein provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Texas that the reason why I bring this bill up at this time is because the Department of Justice is very anxious to have early action upon it. Under the present law there are a large number of criminal cases pending in which it will be impossible to get convictions under the death penalty. That is the reason why I am anxious to bring the bill up at this time, when we have no appropriation bill pressing for disposition to-day.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if an arrangement can be made whereby we can consider this bill in Committee of the Whole? I am in favor of the idea of doing away with capital punishment, as indicated in that bill; but for one I should like to see various amendments adopted by which the jury trying a criminal may fix the penalty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that this is not a bill that would go the Committee of the Whole; but at the same time, by consent of the House, it can be referred to that committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. Can I not couple with my request for unanimous consent a request that the bill be considered as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. In the House, as in Committee of the Whole, or in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HENDERSON. Either one. I want to give the fullest opportunity for discussion and amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I should not oppose the passage of the bill if it were at a little later period, but I should like the law to remain as it is until we can dispose of the cutthroats and robbers that this Government is protecting down in the Indian Territory. After we settle with them I shall have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the gentleman from Texas objects to considering it under any circumstances at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I do not object.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman from Texas does not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], the real father of this measure, who will take charge of this bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the grounds of the objection of my friend from Texas [Mr. COCKRELL] to the consideration of this bill, and therefore can not answer them.

I will state briefly its general provisions. It leaves intact the two sections of the statute governing the Navy and the Army, and does not modify the punishment provided in those sections, which are section 1342, prescribing articles of war for the government of the Army, and section 1624, prescribing articles of war for the government of the Navy.

It abolishes the death penalty as provided in section 4102, Revised Statutes, which gives to consuls in Algiers, the Barbary States, China, Japan, Madagascar, Morocco, Maskat, Persia, Siam, Tripoli, Tunis, and the islands of the South Pacific and Indian oceans, the power to try citizens of the United States or those sailing under her flag. The Ross case illustrated the evil of granting this power to consuls. An English subject who was enrolled on an American vessel was tried for a murder committed in a port in China, and was sentenced to death by the consulate court. He appealed to the President for clemency, and his sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life. On arriving at California, on his way to be incarcerated in the Albany Penitentiary, his attorney applied to the United States court for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that he was deprived of his liberty in violation of the Constitution. That case was carried to the United States Supreme Court, where it was decided that Congress had the right to authorize consular officers beyond the limits of the United States to try without a jury persons sailing under the flag of the United States for offenses named in the statutes. The case was reported in the October term, 1890.

This bill retains the death penalty for the crimes of murder and rape. I presented to the House Committee on the Judiciary a letter dated December 23, 1895, from the district attorney for the eastern district of Texas, asking for the early passage of this bill, and before the cases of a number of criminals now held for trial in that court, which will be held at Paris, Tex., on the 6th of April, are brought to trial. This letter is published in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, No. 108. He stated that he regarded it important that the provision of this bill be enacted as an aid to the administration of justice. Later, in a letter received from him, dated the 3d of March and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 10, when an effort was made to bring the bill before the House, he urges very strongly the enactment of the measure, in order that some punishment may be meted out to men guilty of murder, and yet under such circumstances that juries will fail to convict if the punishment is death.

I had a conversation with a prominent United States judge in one of the Eastern States in reference to the total abolition of the death penalty when a bill for that purpose was before the Fifty-third Congress, and he expressed doubts as to the advisability of the passage of such a bill; but meeting him again before the convening of this Congress, he stated that in a recent trial of a man for murder, in which there was no possible doubt as to his guilt, he had a hung jury because of the reluctance to convict when the punishment was death, and he then thought it desirable to pass a bill having the provisions of the one now under consideration.

I have said that this does not abolish capital punishment, but it will facilitate the administration of justice by the adoption of a principle which has been tried in many of the States of the Union—in almost all the Southern and Western States.

One gentleman said if this bill were passed it would totally abolish capital punishment. I could read from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, if it were worth while to occupy the attention of the House, to show that they have a greater number of executions in those States that allow juries to decide, in proportion to the number of trials, than in States which do not permit juries to determine the punishment. So that persons who believe—as some men honestly do, but I think erroneously—that the death penalty is a preventive of crime will still have that punishment for murder and rape, which offenses constitute almost all that have for a number of years been committed for which the death penalty is prescribed. This bill will enable, as the district attorney from Texas says, the United States courts to punish murder and afford protection to the people of the Indian Territory which is now wanting by reason of the reluctance of juries to bring in verdicts which carry the penalty of death.

I think I have made all the explanation that is necessary in regard to the general provisions of this bill, but if anyone desires to ask questions about it I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that the district attorney of the eastern district of Texas puts his advocacy of this bill upon the ground stated by the gentleman from New York. I understand that the district attorney says in his letter to the Committee on the Judiciary that there is no difficulty in securing convictions for murder in cases of deliberate and atrocious murder, where the killing is done with express malice; but, as the gentleman from New York understands and as we all know, under the laws of the United States there is no division of the offense of murder, so that a killing with express deliberation, with express malice, is punished the same as a killing with implied malice. In many of the States the offenses have been divided into murder in the first degree, meaning killing with express malice, and murder in the second degree, where the killing is without express malice.

Now, as I understand the district attorney, he insists that when a case is brought before a jury where the proof shows that the defendant did the act only with implied malice, malice implied from the circumstances, the jury is loath to convict him, for the reason that he must be sentenced to be hanged; but where the evidence shows that the killing was done with express malice, with deliberate purpose and with a sedate mind, I believe there never has been any trouble in convicting the man of murder. Now, the gentleman's bill facilitates conviction in cases of men charged with murder who the evidence shows committed the act with express malice, with deliberate purpose and a sedate mind; but if the evidence shows that the killing was merely with implied malice, then the jury are given discretion to say, "We find the defendant guilty without capital punishment." There are quite a number of murder cases pending upon the docket in that district——

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Seventy-three.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is, there are 73 cases of men charged with murder in the Indian Territory. Now, I undertake to say that three-fourths of those offenses were committed with what is called implied malice, for there are comparatively few cases of deliberate killing with express malice, and, as I understand the district attorney, he thinks that he may be able to convict a larger number of those charged with that offense and send them to the penitentiary under this bill if it shall become a law than he could convict under the law as it now stands.

Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet, I desire to make a suggestion as to this bill, if the gentleman will pardon me. While I am in favor of the bill and believe that it ought to pass, I think it contains one strange provision. It makes murder punishable by death in certain cases—that is, it makes murder punishable with or without capital punishment, as the jury may see proper—but it makes the crime of treason punishable simply by confinement in the penitentiary.

Now, while it is true that we have but little use for a law against treason, as we never commit that sort of crime in this country, still it seems to me that the offense ought to stand at the head of the calendar.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I accept the interpretation of the views of the district attorney for the eastern district of Texas, as expressed by the distinguished gentleman from that State [Mr. CULBERSON], who was for a long time the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and from whose committee a bill containing substantially the provisions of this one was reported favorably in the Fifty-third Congress. The district attorney, as I understand it, is not opposed to capital punishment in cases of murder committed with premeditation, but he is in favor of the punishment of persons whocommit crimes of a grave character, but now escape conviction because the punishment is death, if of a lesser degree than premeditated murder.

As to the gentleman's suggestion about treason, we have not had a successful trial for treason since 1800. We had them in 1795 and in 1800, but not since, and I think one of the reasons why we have had no successful trials is the fact that nobody can be convicted for that offense when the punishment is death. For my part I do not regard it as one which ought to stand at the head of the calendar. I believe I have shown my devotion to this Union and my desire to maintain it to an extent which would perhaps entitle me to plead for the exclusion of that offense from the statute without being accused of a lack of devotion to the Union or of a proper desire for its perpetuity. I shall yield to the suggestion of the gentleman if it is to be pressed with any force upon the committee, but I hope it will not be. I think the committee will be satisfied that the bill as reported ought to pass as it is, in the language in which it came from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate in the last Congress and from the Judiciary Committee of this House, which has given it very careful consideration.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that this bill does not abolish capital punishment?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It does not abolish it entirely.

Mr. BLUE. I think section 3 does substantially abolish it, and if I read section 4 aright, it is not apparent to me how this bill is to benefit the district attorney of the eastern district of Texas in securing conviction of parties charged with crime under existing law. Probably, however, the proviso does cover the point. But how about the latter part of section 3?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the objection of my friend from Kansas as to section 3, which he thinks does not permit capital punishment under any circumstances, I read that section:

SEC. 3. That the punishment of death prescribed for any offense specified by the statutes of the United States, except in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, is hereby abolished, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

This bill proposes to abolish those obsolete laws relating to offenses for violations of which we have had no successful trials in more than three-quarters—I may say nine-tenths—of a century, and it continues the death penalties for those two offenses which, unfortunately, are rapidly growing in the United States. The passage of this bill, it is believed, will tend to lessen those offenses, and will enable the Government in the administration of justice to bring some punishment upon those who take human life or violate woman's honor.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Why do you not abolish the death penalty altogether?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I should like to do so, but I do not think the House is in favor of it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am.

Mr. BARRETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BARRETT. Is the gentleman from New York ready to accept an amendment to the first section striking out in line 4 the words "murder or," so that murder shall continue to be a capital offense?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That is a capital offense by the bill. I would not like to endanger the bill by an amendment which I think is not necessary. I will explain to the gentleman what the bill provides for.

Mr. BARRETT. I would like to have the gentleman explain the first section.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. This section of the bill was explained in the absence of my friend from Massachusetts. Therefore he did not learn that it exempts from repeal section 1342 relating to the Army, section 1624 relating to the Navy, and the sections relating to murder and rape. These sections are exempted from the repealing provisions of the bill. In certain cases they are not likely to bring in a verdict of guilty if the penalty is death. Perhaps in the case of premeditated murder there would be no difficulty in securing conviction without the clause which we propose to adopt; but where there is no premeditation the jury, without some provision of this kind, will not bring in a verdict of guilty. I am advised to this effect by prosecuting officers in various sections of the Union and by many prominent judges.

Mr. BARRETT. Am I to understand from the gentleman's statement that he proposes to abolish capital punishment for certain crimes simply because in some isolated cases some jury has refused to bring in such a verdict as the prosecuting officer thought ought to have been brought in?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No, sir; I am governed by the history of the United States for the last seventy years, which shows that the two offenses which I have named are multiplying with a rapidity two times greater than the population, while the punishment is decreasing in like proportion.

In 1826 John Quincy Adams, then President, sent to Congress a statement of the trials, convictions, executions, and pardons for offenses under the Government of the United States from the adoption of the Constitution, including the year 1826. That report, Executive Document No. 146, Twentieth Congress, second session, is embodied in this report of the Judiciary Committee, page 4. From that report it appears that during the period I have named there had been 138 trials, in which there were 118 convictions, showing that the sentiment of the people at that time was in full accord with the provisions of the law, and that persons who committed crimes were brought to punishment in accordance with the terms of the statute.

The sentiments of the people have changed. A report made by the Attorney-General of the United States, dated October 21, 1893, in response to my request, shows the number of indictments, convictions, and acquittals for homicides in 1890, 1891, and 1892, and is published on page 5 of the committee's report. It appears that 378 homicides were examined during that period, of which 271 were indicted, 63 convicted, and 12 executed, which shows a marked disinclination on the part of juries to convict in cases where there is doubt as to the intent of the criminal, and where the penalty is death.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Does this apply only to murder, or to cases of murder and manslaughter?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The crimes of murder and manslaughter are both provided for by the statutes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. There is no such thing under the United States law as murder in the second degree?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No, sir. In the last Congress we tried to enact a law defining the crime of murder into first and second degrees, but the Senate would not agree to it.

Mr. PICKLER. Then, this does not apply to manslaughter?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No, sir.

Mr. WALSH. How is that punished?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. By imprisonment.

Mr. WALSH. For how long?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Twenty years, I think.

Mr. GAMBLE. As I understand the gentleman, the expectation of the committee is that this bill will more surely result in conviction. That, I understand, is the reason we are asked to pass it.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. We could not get the Senate to agree to the provision defining different degrees of this crime. The law of Massachusetts and other States defines murder in the first and second degree and manslaughter. When a jury brings in a verdict that the prisoner is guilty of murder the penalty is hanging; if the verdict is manslaughter he is confined in the penitentiary. This bill conforms to the system of practice which prevails in United States courts, which is that of the common law and not statute law. There is, as I have said, a disinclination on the part of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to recognize these different degrees. We, therefore, propose to follow the definitions of the common law as used in the Revised Statutes. Secretary Olney, when Attorney-General, expressed his disapprobation of changing the provisions of the law in respect to definitions, but gave his approval to the modification of penalties as provided in this bill, and so has the present Attorney-General.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, right there, as I understand this bill, when murder is proven, or manslaughter, if the jury think it not a flagrant case, they say no capital punishment.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. In a flagrant case the jury renders the verdict in accordance with the facts, and where the murder is premeditated the extreme punishment allowed by the bill is accorded. But it allows a verdict covering different grades of punishment, as under the statute laws of many States.

Mr. PICKLER. Then, in a case of the kind to which the gentleman refers, where capital punishment is not awarded, the man would necessarily go to prison for life, would he not?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That may be the sentence.

Mr. PICKLER. Would not that be a pretty severe punishment in certain cases?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It may be; but certainly is not a greater punishment than to be hung. Nor is it so harsh upon the people as to allow a man guilty of murder to be let loose on the community. This matter, I will say to my friend, has been given careful consideration by the Judiciary Committee of this House in the last Congress, in the Committee of the Senate on the Judiciary in the last Congress, as well as the Judiciary Committee of the House of this Congress; and when my friend from Texas, Judge CULBERSON, rises and says that he approved of this bill, he brings to its support a knowledge of the law and a judicial character that is not excelled in the United States.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit some observations in regard to this bill from the standpoint of my own personal judgment and not from the standpoint of what somebody else may have said or thought.

I have had the misfortune, or the good fortune, as the case may be, to have practiced law ever since 1857, with some slight intervals, in a general country practice, where I have been compelled to practice in the criminal courts as well as in the civil, and a great part of the time have been compelled of necessity to take any case offered that was entirely a proper case to consider and would yield a contribution toward my support. That of necessity brought me in contact with a great line of the criminal proceedings in Ohio, and especially many prominent cases of homicide, cases in which I participated on one side or the other; and so, if I shall show a little tendency toward egotism in the discussion of this question, this fact will be my only apology.

I join heartily with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] in wishing to curtail the number of cases in which the death penalty can be applied, but I do not support this bill, and I base my objection upon a ground that is radical and goes to the very foundation of the whole proposition.

I do not believe that the jury ought to fix the penalty in any case. There are so well-defined lines of distinction in the grades of crime against persons in this country that there is no difficulty about the verdict of the jury on the mere question of fact; but there is a great deal of difficulty about the action of the jury if allowed to pass judgment. That has been my observation, and that seems to be the logical and necessary conclusion, based upon human nature, which is pretty nearly a uniform thing throughout this country as well as throughout all of the other countries of the world.

Now, as to the different degrees of homicides——

Mr. CURTIS of New York. If the gentleman desires it, I have the statutes before me. The Ohio law has but one offense—murder in the first degree; but the jury may convict of less degree.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The whole difficulty with the gentleman from New York, and I appreciate his knowledge of this question, and am satisfied that his study has been exhaustive on the lines of his personal opinion—but the great difficulty, it seems to me, has not been as to the public judgment, or the judicial judgment, about what ought to be the death penalty, but that we ought to have some milder form of punishment. The great difficulty has been the commingling of the grades of offenses in a single section. Now, if we could have the three definitions of homicide, as laid down by the law of Ohio, and there may be some others in some of the States, and in fact there are many more in some of them, but the distinctions are too finely drawn, too metaphysical for the average man and the average jury; but with the three distinct definitions laid down in the statutes there would be no difficulty about the question, and then you get rid of hindrances or barriers, which I insist ought to exist where murder in the first degree has actually and without doubt been committed.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. If the gentleman will permit me, as he understands there are three definitions of murder, but we have but two in the United States statutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The Department of Justice has been opposed to the modification of the definition as furnished by the common law; the Senate also has been opposed to it, and in order to meet the difficulties which we found to exist, the bill as originally passed was modified and amended. It was passed in the last Congress to meet the definition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a concession completely onto the ground on which I stand. The Department of Justice is not a legislative body, and with all due respect to the Attorneys-General who have been at its head, I am not willing to yield my judgment on this question to the opinion of the Department of Justice.

The gentleman now at the head of it is a very distinguished lawyer. I have known him during all the time of his practice of the law and, strange as it may seem, it is my judgment that he never tried a criminal case in his life. He has been a member of the great and distinguished law firm of Hoadly, Johnson & Coulson, and later of Harmon, Coulson, and another. He is a splendid lawyer and a most estimable man, but his whole practice has consisted in his relation to large corporations, several of the great railroad lines centering in Cincinnati and many of the other great corporations, and in the general practice of the law on the civil side of the courts. So if he has expressed an opinion about this statute and any opposition to these definitions it simply proves, in my judgment, that he has not given full consideration to this important subject.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I have no wish to be misunderstood as to the question of definition. I have not discussed it with the present Attorney-General, but he has approved of the passage of this bill in the form in which it is, as a measure to promote the administration of justice.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is his recommendation in writing? I should like to know how fully he discusses the question.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It is not discussed very fully, sir, but I will read the indorsement which came from the Department. It is as follows:

> The passage of this bill, H. R. No. 878, will promote the administration of justice, and I recommend its speedy enactment.
> HOLMES CONRAD,
> Acting Attorney-General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That gives very imperfect information to me. While ordinarily I bow——

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I hope my friend will not assume that I was attempting to instruct him. The gentleman having said that he has considered this matter upon his own judgment, without aid of the opinions of other people, I do not offer it to the gentleman to instruct him in anyway, but simply to show what the Attorney-General thinks about it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That statement of mine is subject to the modification governing every act of my life—that I value the knowledge of everybody that I could get hold of to shape my own by; but I do not necessarily yield my opinion upon a question of so much importance as this simply to the opinion, which we all understand is so imperfectly delivered generally, coming from the head of one of these Departments.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Of course this is a matter of considerable importance, and I trust the gentleman will not see fit to oppose the bill, for I believe it is a step in the right direction; and while, if I had my way, I frankly say to the gentleman from Ohio, I would do as we have done in New York—have the statutes of the United States define the crime of murder in the first degree, the crime of murder in the second degree, and then define the various degrees of manslaughter. Still, this is the best we can do at this time. We proceeded on the other line in the Fifty-third Congress, but the Senate advocated this bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would not have more than one degree of manslaughter.

Mr. RAY. There the gentleman and I disagree, and other lawyers as a rule would fail to come to an exact understanding. They could not all look at this question alike. Now, it has been my good fortune or my misfortune, as the case may be, for thirty years to practice extensively in the criminal courts, and I have had experience in capital cases as well as all other criminal cases, and I have, I think, some knowledge of the difficulties that arise in the administration of justice. Now, I think there is time here, and I should like, if the gentleman will permit, to ask him to give to the House his definition of murder in the first degree as he would have it could he have his way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; I will do that with pleasure. I have been making ready to do that.

Mr. RAY. And then I should like to have the gentleman, if he will, go a step further and define murder in the second degree as he would have it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. RAY. And then manslaughter. The gentleman, as I understand him to say, would have manslaughter only in one degree.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In only one degree.

Mr. RAY. And I should like to have him define manslaughter as he would have it could he have his way.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman allow me just a word?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to say here and now that I am in full accord with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] on this subject, and during the last Congress we reported a bill from the Judiciary Committee upon the exact lines on which the gentleman is now proceeding. The bill went over to the Senate, the Senate declined to pass it, and this is an amendment or substitute which they proposed then, and which was adopted now because we believed no other bill could pass.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am now taught by the two gentlemen who have stated it that that is the fact, but it only leads up to this question, whether we shall fail to do what in our judgment is right because we are said to have an uneducated and unintelligent Senate to deal with at the other end of this Capitol. [Laughter.] That is all.

Now let me proceed along the line suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], which is precisely the point up to which I was leading, and then I will point out why, so long as the statute remains as it is, the jury should not be limited to the answering of a single question. If I were to have my way I should define murder in the first degree as follows:

Whoever purposely, either of deliberate or premeditated malice, or by means of poison, or in perpetrating or in attempting to perpetrate any rape, arson, robbery, or burglary, kills another shall be guilty of murder in the first degree.

Now, if I were to strike out any word in that section it might be possible that I would strike out the word "robbery." There is a field for discussion there.

But it seems to me that in the light of our study of this great question the man who, with premeditated malice and who purposely, maliciously, with premeditation and deliberation, takes the life of another ought to be hung; and there ought to be no difficulty in getting an intelligent jury to say that that condition of fact has been proved.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.

Mr. RAY. Now, right there comes in the difficulty in the trial of a capital case. Oftentimes there can be no question that there was deliberation, that there was premeditation by the person doing the killing, but then again a case very often arises where there is a sharp conflict of fact as to whether or not there was deliberation and premeditation. Our courts in New York have stated and held that it was immaterial as to the length of time——

Mr. GROSVENOR. So in Ohio.

Mr. RAY (continuing). Given for premeditation. If there was a length of time, even three seconds, during which a man premeditated, he might have formed a deliberate intent to take the life of another, no matter how great the provocation, there being no justification for the killing. The gentleman will understand that there is a great deal of difference between provocation and justification, as I am using the words now and in the legal sense.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. RAY. Now, when that condition of affairs exists, a sharp conflict of fact arising over this question of deliberation and premeditation, the jury stand out. They are all honest; they are all fair; they all mean to do right; but they stand out; they disagree; they remain out hours and days; and the jury is discharged and months pass before another trial can be had; the feeling, the excitement over the case subsides, and that better instinct of humanity begins to prevail—perhaps not the better instinct, but a sort of feeling of pity, a kindly feeling arises, and you go again to the trial of the offender, and you are further from obtaining a conviction than ever. I do not want to make a speech in the gentleman's time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. You are talking very well, and seem to be making a good speech.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman will pardon me. I wanted to call out sharply that line of argument so that the gentleman might reply to it. At the second trial you will have only one or two on the jury who will stand for a conviction for murder; others will want to let the defendant off, or to convict of a lesser crime; and you have another disagreement. I believe that when a crime has been committed the speedy trial and conviction of the criminal is quite as essential for the good of the community as anything connected with the administration of justice. The certainty rather than the severity of punishment best protects society. So it goes on in that way, and the law is robbed of its power. Now, I ask the gentleman right there, if it is not well to have the law so modified, as this bill does it, as to give the jury a chance to agree on the first trial, if divided in opinion and sentiment, as they oftentimes are, by permitting them, if they can not agree upon a verdict of murder in the first degree, to say we will modify our verdict by saying, "Guilty; not death, but imprisonment for life." Now, is not that the better way, I ask the gentleman?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am very sorry my time is being exhausted by other gentlemen, not in asking questions but making very able speeches, much more so than I can make. Now let me answer. The gentleman has broken entirely the line of argument I was making and carries me away to a new field, and I must stand on my feet and think and answer. The very purpose he has in view is defeated by the subject under consideration, and the very purpose he has in view is shown by the proposition which I make. Here, now, is a single count of an indictment which charges murder in the first degree; it charges the life of the victim was taken by the defendant with premeditation and deliberation, purposely and of malice, and then the court defines all these grades of homicide, which are so simple that I should not like to be tried by a jury who did not know the difference between premeditation and deliberation and mere purpose to kill. Having defined the grades of homicide, the court says now, notwithstanding here is a charge of murder in the first degree, you may find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, of manslaughter, or of assault and battery; so that this question of failing to agree is wholly answered by the proposition that the jury may fix the grade of the crime clear down to a mere misdemeanor instead of a felony.

Mr. RAY rose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will permit, I really must be allowed to have some continuity in my argument.

Mr. RAY. I understand that. I was going to ask——

Mr. GROSVENOR. If you will ask me a question and not make another of those lengthy speeches, I will yield.

Mr. RAY. I want to state that in the United States courts juries are not permitted to do that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Precisely; and that is what I am talking about. I want them to be allowed to do it, and now is the time to fix it so that they can do it. Now is the time to pass a bill defining murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree and manslaughter. Murder in the first degree I have already referred to. Murder in the second degree is exactly the same as murder in the first degree except that there is no premeditation or deliberation. Manslaughter is the taking of the life of a human being while the slayer is in the commission of an unlawful act. It is well defined in the statutes of Ohio and of other States. "Whoever unlawfully kills another except as provided in the last three sections, is guilty of manslaughter." That is all there is about it. There is no premeditation or deliberation in manslaughter, there is probably no purpose to kill; but the slayer does kill while he is in the commission of an unlawful act. He has made an assault upon the deceased, or he has committed some aggression against his property, and while the deceased has been defending himself or his property the action of the accused has resulted in his death, without premeditation, without purpose.

That is the definition of manslaughter, and there is a wide discretion in the court in fixing the penalty. So by this system of definitions and distinctions, so easily understood, you leave it in the power of the jury after all to compromise their opinions in framing their verdict, and, let me say right here, that a jury which will feel sympathy for a defendant to such a degree that they will not say that he committed the offense with premeditation and deliberation will never affix to their verdict the penalty of death. It is said that in some of these cases that penalty ought not to be inflicted. I agree that that is so, but in most of the States of the Union there exists a method of mitigating the penalty. In Ohio and Pennsylvania there are boards of pardons, and in New York there is, I understand, an equivalent to that, in the power of the governor to appoint a commission to ascertain and report facts, which is exactly the jurisdiction of the pardon board in Ohio, and the governor has plenary power to modify the sentence in any given case. Thus you let subsequent facts and developments operate rather than compel the jury to fix the penalty at the time of the trial.

Mr. Chairman, after a long experience at the bar in the active trial of cases, I agree with the gentleman from New York that the jury generally intend to be honest; but neither the gentleman from New York nor any other practitioner of any considerable experience will hesitate to admit that juries sometimes render most wonderful and absurd verdicts.

Let me mention one that was rendered in the State of Ohio in the famous case of The State vs. Arrison, tried in the city of Cincinnati. The defendant was charged with having constructed an infernal machine, as it was called, and having sent it to an enemy, whom it killed. He had a bitter grudge against the superintendent of one of the hospitals, had made threats against his life, and had spent three or four months in the construction of what was called an infernal machine. He sent it to the hospital and it exploded and killed the superintendent instantly, as I recollect.

The man was tried. He was one of those persons who would have affected the jury greatly in the matter of his sentence, and after a very full trial, and when the facts demonstrated that he was either wholly innocent or else was guilty of a most malicious and premeditated murder, the jury brought him in guilty of manslaughter. So, in a more recent case not very many years ago, in one of the counties not far from where I live, though in another district, a man was found guilty of poisoning his mother, and the verdict was "manslaughter," although he had deliberately purchased the poison and put it into the coffee, or some other food or drink, and had taken the old lady's life. So, in my humble judgment, it will not do to trust too much to the jury. You should keep the jury confined to the questions of fact. Let them determine, first: Did the defendant commit this act?

What is the fact about that? You have to leave to the jury other questions much more complicated than the one referred to by the gentleman from New York. You have to commit to them the great question in a very large number of homicide cases, the question of self-defense. The court has to submit to the jury not only the question "Did he fear?" but also the other important question, "Had he just grounds to fear that he was in danger of grave bodily harm or of death?" Now, that is a question of fact so subtle, involving so much of mental calculation and mental ascertainment, that sometimes the jury will go widely astray. Therefore, why commit to the jury these other questions, when upon the bench sits a judge coolly and deliberately scanning the evidence, a man of wide knowledge and experience of witnesses and of weighing their testimony? Again, you have to commit to the jury the more occult and difficult question of mental responsibility. That is a question of fact in the abstract, but really it involves the weighing of the testimony of experts, the critical examination of facts, the bringing to bear upon the solution of the question of the judgment and the knowledge of the jury, and after having submitted to the jury questions like these, and they having found a verdict upon the facts, why place also upon them the responsibility of saying what was the degree of turpitude and what is the right thing to do in the way of punishment?

I read not very long ago in a law magazine devoted to criminal law an account of the action of two juries in the same county. One jury found one man guilty of the crime of horse stealing and sent him to the penitentiary for something like ten years. The other jury found a man guilty of murder and sent him to the penitentiary for one year. Not many years ago, in a county adjoining that in which I live, a jury was impaneled to try a man charged with the crime of living in a state of adultery. The evidence was perfectly plain; there was nothing obscure about it; and the jury found the man guilty, and the court sentenced him under our misdemeanor act. Two days afterwards the same jury—or as nearly the same jury as we ordinarily have—tried the woman upon the same charge and the same evidence and found her not guilty.

These are some of the anomalies of trial by jury. Yet we have that system and we must get along with it as best we can. But why now broaden the power of the jury and commit to it the power not only to say that the defendant is guilty of some crime as defined by the court, but to define the crime itself as well as fix the penalty?

Now, the great trouble—and here is my objection to this bill—the great trouble, as I think both of the gentlemen from New York will concede, has grown up from our having this single section covering the crime of murder. That is the reason juries will not convict. I took part in the trial of a case here in the District of Columbia, and when we gave it to the jury we were enabled on behalf of the defendant to say to them, "You must either acquit this man or you must hang him; he is either guilty of murder, the penalty of which is death, or he is not guilty of anything." The jury said he was not guilty of anything. Had there been any provision of law under which the jury could have found a verdict of manslaughter, doubtless public justice would not have been outraged as it was thought to have been by the verdict of that jury—although I disagreed with public opinion on that question, as we generally do when we are interested in the trial of a case. For in this case the acquittal was perfectly justified.

I agree that the law on this subject is wholly defective and ought to be changed, but I see no reason why in doing this we may not proceed intelligibly to define the different grades of homicide, fixing the penalty for each, thus acting in accord with what we understand perfectly well to be the "gathered wisdom of a thousand years," as a former colleague of mine would say.

Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly. I am pretty nearly through.

Mr. RAY. I presume the gentleman understands we have tried to bring about the reform that he suggests. We have tried to grade these crimes into murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, and manslaughter with one or more degrees. That was the sentiment pervading the Judiciary Committee of the House, and the bill which passed the House in the last Congress was framed upon that basis. But when it went to the Senate that body absolutely refused to concur. So we found ourselves blocked in our attempted reformation of the law. Now, a step in the right direction is proposed here; in other words, if we can not have a whole loaf we are willing to take a part, we are willing to take what we can get. If we can break into this antiquated statute which was placed upon the statute book away back in 1790, there having been some amendment made, I think, a little later—I believe one amendment in 1825—if we can break into this antiquated statute, if we can bring the United States Government to take one step in the same direction as those which have been taken by nearly all the States of the Union, is it not better to do this than to have all legislation on the subject fail?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, that argument commends itself to my judgment, and it would be convincing but for this one trouble: We are entering here upon a new and radical departure by giving to the jury the power to fix these sentences. All else would be entirely satisfactory to me; I would accept it as a step in the right direction. But I have never known any man in the United States who was once entitled to vote to be deprived of his vote; I have never known an elective judiciary to be transformed into an appointive one, and I have never known the power of a jury once given by statute to be taken away. I do not believe that the better judgment of the people of the United States, as manifested in their codes of criminal procedure, is in favor of this innovation. Therefore I hesitate to consent that the Congress of the United States shall enter upon it.

While I am on my feet, and while I am making a speech that has no politics in it—gentlemen ought all to be delighted at that circumstance [laughter]——

Mr. RAY. You seem to be standing up for the laws of Ohio very well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have referred to the laws of Ohio simply because I am more familiar with the decisions under them than with those of other States. And I will say, by way of compliment to the gentleman's State, that we have taken our code of civil procedure bodily from the State of New York, and have largely drawn our criminal procedure also from that State. And we have cited and followed wherever applicable the opinions of the able court of appeals of New York in all the great leading criminal cases. And I have spoken of a single degree of manslaughter because I am familiar with the practice of the courts in reference to that. I have no doubt that the same argument that is now applied to subdividing the degrees of murder would apply and could apply with equal force to the multiplicity of the degrees of manslaughter. I think there is as much philosophy in one as the other.

But, Mr. Chairman, while on my feet I wish to commend to the Judiciary Committee, which upon all these questions is the great committee of the House, the able committee of the House, to an investigation of a single condition to which I wish to point their attention. The gentleman refers me to the fact that this is a murder statute dating back to 1790. The committee will find many other conditions in the District of Columbia that date back to a period apparently during the Dark Ages, and yet they stand here as provisions of the statutes, not of the District of Columbia, but the statutes which operate on the people of the District of Columbia.

I had occasion to refer to it in a few remarks some weeks ago at the Board of Trade banquet in this city. I found myself here on one occasion trying a case before a court-martial, and a witness was called on the stand who was asked a preliminary question on the part of counsel opposed to the suspected testimony of the witness. The counsel said he wanted to ask him a question or two, and asked him if he believed in God. Well, the fellow gave some sort of equivocating answer; I do not now remember exactly what it was. He was then asked if he believed in a future state of rewards and punishment, and I found him to entertain a considerable doubt about his answer to the question, but to my utter amazement they produced a statute, which I learned to my entire satisfaction was then and is now in force in the District of Columbia, a statute that forbade him to testify, and he was ruled off the witness stand. Now, there is a question that I should like very much to have the Judiciary Committee consider in connection with the government of the District of Columbia, and as soon as the Committee on the Judiciary has the time to formulate and introduce an act in reference to criminal proceedings in the District of Columbia I hope that they will take into consideration this entire question.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. We will take that up next.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And while we are building magnificent monuments and works of art to commemorate the heroism and patriotism of our people; when we are building splendid buildings to demonstrate the growth in architecture of our country; while we are trying to construct libraries to be the honor and wonder of the world, not only, I trust, the Congressional Library, but some day a public library that the people of the United States will have some interest in directly, in the form of taxation; while we are doing all this and setting an example to all the world as well as to our own people; while we are offering to all the world a splendid city full of educational institutions and educational advantages and all of that, I think the time has come when we should have a model code of procedure to settle the rights of man in this District, and move away from the ancient landmarks which have been forgotten in the States and go forward to the construction of a model code, a model system of courts, a model system of the vindication of the rights of persons and property in this territory, which we alone can legislate for.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in his desire to have a model code of judicial procedure in the city of Washington; but I do not believe, however, that anyone will envy him the job of clearing away the old rubbish which now exists in the laws and the administration of justice in this District. I believe, however, that if all the absurd things which he has enumerated have been done in the courts of this country, they will not be enhanced by the passage of this bill. But, furthermore, my friend from Ohio, when pleading for capital punishment, informs us that there is a board of pardons. I would like to know what good a board of pardons will do to a man after he has been hung. I do not see how a pardon granted in this world can reach him then. If I understand the jurisdiction of that board of pardons, it does not extend beyond the boundary of time or life, and when a man has been hung or shot for crime I am sure that it will not be contended that he can be benefited by the exercise of human clemency.

Now, there is but one reason for inflicting punishment for crime, and that is the protection of society. We have no right to deal out punishment to any man, no matter what crime he has committed, as a reward of merit. It is not within the limit of the rights or powers of any man, however good, or of any court, however wise and just, to measure the depths of human guilt and adjust an exact measure of punishment for it. Only that Supreme Power which is not itself sinful and is endowed with perfection in goodness and wisdom is fitted for that task.

But society has the right and it is its duty to protect and preserve itself, and, so far as it may be necessary in order to do so, to restrain and punish criminals. Thus far it is warranted in going; no further.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the history of the effect of capital punishment in the past? Has it decreased crime? Why, when men were hanged in England for picking pockets, right at the foot of the gallows pockets were picked when an offender was going up the gallows stairs for having committed that crime. This was not an uncommon occurrence. The whole history of crime in this country and Europe is that it has not been diminished by severity of punishment, but rather by certainty of punishment. We have tried that in my own State. For a long time we had a law which provided that a man should be hanged for committing murder or other capital crime, but he was to go to the penitentiary for one year, there, I suppose, to prepare himself to meet another final judgment which would be pronounced upon him in the next world. He was not to be hanged, however, until the governor should issue his warrant for that purpose. The governors never issued their warrant, so that we had in practice imprisonment for life for murder, arson, rape, and other capital crimes.

But some of our friends who preferred to live by the code of Moses rather than the code of the Man of Nazareth were urgent to have capital punishment reestablished. We did reestablish it. What was the result? During the few years that we hanged men for murder there were more murders in the State of Maine than we had before that time. We kept that law on the statute book but a few years.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Four years.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I think we hanged two or three people; not more than that. The effect of capital punishment was such that by a consensus of opinion of almost all the people of the State it was abolished, and there is no such thing as capital punishment known in my State now. Men are imprisoned for life instead of being hanged for murder. What has been the result since? There has been less capital crime than there was before. So that I say the only purpose for which we have a right to punish crime, namely, the purpose of protecting society, has been better subserved without capital punishment than with it. The fact that the Government takes human life has, I believe, a brutalizing effect upon the community. It surely does not Christianize or have the influence to elevate and refine the vicious classes. It sets for them an example of the shedding of blood.

One thing more. When the jury understands that the punishment for capital crime is not death, it is more easy to secure a verdict of conviction than when they know that if they happen to make a mistake they will send an innocent man into eternity without the possibility of recall. When we have imprisonment for life as a penalty for crime, if a mistake is made, it may afterwards be discovered and justice be done. Such things have often occurred. Then the board of pardons can exercise its authority with practical effect.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. BRUMM. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. When you reestablished capital punishment, did you have the system of defining murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, and manslaughter?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes; we always have had that, and have now. There has never been a time since the State was organized that we did not have it.

Mr. BRUMM. And you say even under that system more murders were committed. I wish to ask whether the penalty of death was limited to murder in the first degree?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes; and the records show that there were more murders when murderers were punished with death than there are now.

Mr. BRUMM. Was the penalty of death limited to murder in the first degree only?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, it was when the alleged crime was murder.

Mr. BRUMM. I wanted to know that fact.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill seeks to establish the law for all places under the jurisdiction of the United States as it has existed in the State of California for over twenty years.

In the winter of 1873–74 Senator PERKINS introduced into the senate of California a bill allowing juries to fix the punishment for capital offenses. It passed the senate, came to the house, and I had the honor of having charge of that bill and getting it through the assembly of California.

This has been the law of that State now for over twenty years, and it is perfectly safe to say that it will never be changed. Twenty-five years ago I heard a judge in a court in California charge the jury substantially to this effect: That it was shown by the evidence that the crime was murder, was in the first degree, or there was no offense committed. It could not be murder in the second degree. It was murder in the first degree, and the penalty for that was death. That jury, because there was a grain of doubt, brought in a verdict of acquittal, and the man went clear. There was not a man in the community, hardly, but believed that man was a murderer; and events afterwards proved that he was, but he escaped. You know that in many cases there are crimes of such brutality that the demon who commits them has no longer a right to live; and in California, under that law, they hang them. The jury there in bringing in a verdict are allowed by the law to add in their discretion, as they see fit, after their verdict of guilty in the first degree the words "and we fix the penalty at imprisonment for life." If they do not add these words to the verdict, then the penalty is death. And I may say that in the State of California since the enactment of that law as many murderers have been hanged as before its enactment.

This law is right. It is founded on common sense and justice. It is the law of many States, and it should be the law of this District and of all places where the United States has jurisdiction. It has been eminently satisfactory. It gives the criminal where it is evident the crime is murder in the first degree or no crime the benefit of the doubt, and the jury can send him to prison if they see fit. So that if in the years after any new evidence should come up, the criminal may have the benefit of it. I hope this bill will pass; it ought to pass.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, the statutes of the United States do not define the crime of murder or divide it into degrees, hence the common law definition obtains, and hence this bill now before the House.

I desire as briefly as I may to answer the only objection that thus far has been urged against the proposed measure, and which came from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. He did not oppose the passage of this bill because he thought it wrong in principle, but simply because he does not think it goes far enough in reforming the law. If the House will have patience with me, attention will be called to the laws on this subject written upon the statute books. I find that in the year 1790 this act was passed—it was amended slightly in 1825 and slightly in 1875:

Every person who commits murder—

Without particularly defining it—

within any fort, arsenal, dockyard, magazine, or any other place or district of country in the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; second, or upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay within the admiralty or maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State; three, or who upon any such waters maliciously strikes, stabs, wounds, poisons, or shoots any other person, and of which striking, stabbing, wounding, poisoning, or shooting such other person dies, either on land or at sea, within or without the United States, shall suffer death.

And that is the only punishment. That or nothing. Now let me call your intelligent attention to another section of the Revised Statutes which goes with it. This section was adopted in 1790 and has never been changed or amended.

The court before which any person is convicted of murder may, in its discretion, add to the punishment of death—

Now, here you get your punishment after death. Those who do not believe in punishment after death will find that it is written in the statutes of the United States that there is punishment after death, and that it is a statutory punishment under the United States law. Let me read.

Section 5340 of the Revised Statutes provides—

The court before which any person is convicted of murder may, in its discretion, add to the punishment of death that the body of the offender be delivered to a surgeon, at the discretion of the court. And the marshal who executes such judgment shall deliver the body after execution to such surgeon as the court may direct, and such surgeon, or some person by him appointed, shall receive and take away the body at the time of execution.

And then, if any relative or friend of the dead man who is to be thus punished after death shall interfere in any way with this discretion, this drawing and quartering of the deceased, he is to be punished.

The law says:

That every person who, after execution, by force rescues or attempts to rescue the dead body of any offender out of the custody of the marshal or of the officers during the conveyance of such body to any place for dissection as provided in section 5340, or by force rescues or attempts to rescue such body from the house of any surgeon where the same has been deposited in pursuance of that section, shall be liable to a fine of not more than $100 and to imprisonment for not more than twelve months.

Prior to 1790 several hundred offenses were punished with death, and in many cases the criminal was not only strung upon the gallows, but was, after death or before, as was deemed most suitable and consistent with offended justice, drawn and quartered—that is, cut up into four pieces. Our wise and humane forefathers thought it better to provide that the victim of outraged justice be cut up fine—that is, made into judicial mince-meat.

If I could have my way I would blot from the statutes of the United States the two sections last read. I believe that when a man has suffered the extreme penalty of death, if any relative or friend appears to claim his body we ought to give it over for decent burial, and it should not be surrendered for dissection, except in cases where no person claims it for burial. These two sections are relics of a barbarous age, and I believe that the punishment of death inflicted for murder, as defined by the common law, and for these other offenses defined in subdivision 3 of section 5350 of the Revised Statutes, is a relic of the same age.

The Judiciary Committee of this House in the last Congress, and I believe in the preceding Congress, acted to some extent in accordance with that idea. Nearly every State in this Union has taken advanced ground on this subject. In the several States murder has been defined by statute in accordance with modern ideas. In New York we have divided it into two degrees, murder in the first and murder in the second degree; murder in the first degree being the killing of a human being without justification, with deliberation and premeditation, or where it is committed without deliberation or premeditation, but by a person engaged in the commission of a felony against either the person or the property of some individual.

That is the law of the State of New York, which has been copied and followed without material alteration in many of the States of the Union. We go further and define manslaughter in its various degrees, some States having but one degree, others two or more. Whether it is wise to have two or three degrees of manslaughter needs no discussion here and now. The difference of opinion simply shows that the lawmakers of the various States have different minds on this subject; but we all agree substantially in the proposition that these crimes ought to be divided into two degrees, for the guidance of the jury, and in order that when a person is indicted for the crime of murder he may be convicted of a defined crime, a crime made up of certain criminal elements.

A division into degrees gives the jury, after they have considered all the facts in the case, an opportunity to classify the crime where it properly belongs under the law and the evidence, and if indicted for murder the defendant may be convicted of a lesser crime; but under the practice in the United States courts if a man is indicted for murder he must be either convicted or acquitted if the jury agrees.

This is all wrong. The district attorney may think an indictment for murder can be sustained, when in fact an indictment for manslaughter only is the proper record; or the jury may be so divided in opinion that a verdict can only be reached by acquitting the defendant when a crime has been committed. The jury so think, and are only prevented from convicting by reason of the severity of the punishment that must follow conviction.

Mr. HEPBURN. One of the reasons that has been assigned by others for the passage of this bill is that we have not adapted the criminal law of the United States to these modern ideas. Now, why is it not a great deal better to begin at the right place and make these changes of definition in the United States statutes that are so essential, and thus do away with the necessity for the particular advantage which the committee have pointed out in the bill now before the House.

Mr. RAY. I was about to come to that proposition. There was no substantial disagreement, although there was some difference of opinion, in the Committee on the Judiciary in the last Congress, in the preceding Congress, and in this Congress upon the proposition that we ought to revise the criminal statutes of the United States, define murder, separate it into two degrees, and then define and divide manslaughter in one, two, or more degrees, fix the punishment, and then provide that where a person is indicted for homicide, whether murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree, the jury shall be at liberty to convict the offender of any lesser offense in the same grade. We did pass such a bill as that in this House, and it went to the Senate and there it was killed. They would not take that step in legislation. Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] referred a while ago to the Senate in a way that I need not repeat. If the Senate of the United States does not come as fresh from the people as the House of Representatives——

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I want to say that my reference to the Senate was only incidental and that I did not and would not use any disrespectful language of that body.

Mr. RAY. Oh, I understand that no disrespect was intended by the gentleman, but I fully agree with him that we have too many old fogies in the Senate of the United States. [Laughter.] I fully agree with him that when we get younger and fresher blood in the Senate we shall have less difficulty in making laws which the people of the United States want and will be benefited by. I am not afraid to say that much with regard to the Senate of the United States, even if I should lose my seat in this House for the saying of it. I will stand by that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is the gentleman a candidate for United States Senator?

Mr. RAY. He is not. The gentleman from New York would have all of the qualifications essential to a good Senator except the funds. [Laughter.] He could not raise sufficient money to enable him to carry through the first step of a candidacy. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. I was in hopes that a gentleman entertaining such views would be a candidate for Senator.

Mr. RAY. No, sir; there is no use of my being a candidate. I own neither a bank nor a brewery. I can not get there. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me proceed to answer the gentleman from Iowa. When that proposed law was defeated in the Senate we were not discouraged in the House; we again took up the subject and were furnished valuable information by my colleague [Mr. CURTIS], who has worked years on this subject and has compiled most valuable statistics.

We found that while the States have been progressing in this matter of punishment for crime the United States has been standing still, clinging to a statute passed in 1790, when our criminal code was in its infancy. It is well to go slow in making or changing laws, but this does not signify absolute nonaction. We can unchain ourselves from the antiquated statutes of the past without danger of rushing into follies or unwise legislation.

The committee believed that it was best to take a step in the right direction, though we can not take all the steps that we believe ought to be taken. So we propose that in all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder or rape—I will not stop to read the whole language of the section—"the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto 'without capital punishment,' and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment to hard labor for life."

Now, if the gentleman will scan that language carefully he will see that it is substantially equivalent to an enactment dividing murder into two degrees; because if the jury is not willing to convict of murder in the first degree—that is, if they can not all agree upon the proposition that the offender has committed the homicide without justification and with deliberation and premeditation—they may attach to their verdict the qualification "without capital punishment," and that is equivalent to finding the prisoner guilty of murder in the second degree, as defined by the laws of the State of New York.

Mr. CONNOLLY. How can you divide the crime of rape into degrees?

Mr. RAY. We can not. Of course, Mr. Chairman, you can not divide rape into different degrees; but I will say this—that the crime of rape might be committed under circumstances which would demand that the offender suffer the extreme penalty of the law—circumstances where he ought to suffer death—although those cases would be rare, and there might be other cases where the jury would believe that the offender ought not to suffer death, and in these cases under the law as it now stands the offender would be acquitted by the jury or there would be a disagreement of the jury, so that the offender would in the end go scot free. If you adopt this bill and make it the law of the land, you will have more convictions—a speedy vindication of the law—a speedy protection to society. You will have less rape in these United States. So with the crime of murder. If you give to the jury this discretion, this right to modify their verdict, you will have less murder within the jurisdiction of the United States; you will have more convictions, and the convictions that you do have will be more speedy. The law will be vindicated, and society will be protected. The certainty, not the severity of punishment, prevents crime.

As I said a few moments ago to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] if we can not have a full loaf let us take what bread we can get, because if we adopt this bill and send it to the Senate of the United States we are substantially assured in advance that it will pass that body and become the law of the land.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he feels entirely satisfied that the proviso of section 4 is altogether within the limitations of the Constitution of the United States concerning ex post facto laws. That section provides that concerning offenses heretofore committed—

Juries may return qualified verdicts in such cases according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, and the sentences shall be imposed as therein provided.

Now, the punishment of these crimes at the time they were committed was death. Here is a provision for a different penalty. Is it safe to adopt such a provision? Is there not danger that it may result in a general jail delivery for all criminals now awaiting trial for these offenses?

Mr. RAY. I think not. I think this bill as it now stands is perfectly safe in its provisions in that regard. This question was most carefully considered and examined into by the Judiciary Committee. It has been repeatedly held that you may lessen the punishment after the commission of the crime, but you can not increase it.

Mr. POWERS. Is it not a complete answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] to say that the meaning of the Constitution in declaring that no ex post facto law shall be passed is that no act which when it was committed was innocent shall afterwards be declared a crime? But it does not touch at all the question of the penalty that shall be enforced or inflicted.

Mr. RAY. I think that is undoubtedly true. But I can say further that it has been held in the State of New York (and I do not think it has been questioned anywhere throughout the land) that a statute lessening the punishment which has been provided for a certain crime does not infringe the constitutional prohibition of ex post facto laws.

Mr. HEPBURN. I find on page 7 of the report of the committee "Table No. 3." Has the gentleman any information in regard to where the material for this table was procured? Here is a statement that in 1895 there were 10,500 homicides in the United States. Is that thought by the Judiciary Committee to be correct?

Mr. RAY. No doubt it is correct. These statistics have been most carefully gathered by my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], and his assistants. If he wishes to make a statement on this question, I will yield to him.

Mr. HEPBURN. By this table it appears that the increase of homicides in six years is nearly 150 per cent—an increase from 4,290 to 10,500.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The percentage of increase is even greater than the gentleman states. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry as to the source of the information which is here published on my authority, I will say that the Chicago Tribune has for a number of years compiled daily from its files and from its exchanges the accounts of various murders reported in different sections of the United States; and those that thus came to the knowledge of that paper in 1895 amounted to 10,500; and there were probably 10 per cent more the information of which did not reach that office. That paper has a department devoted to the collection of statistics of crime, and these lists as compiled during a given year are published on the first day of the succeeding year.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what was the theory, or on what theory, the committee acted in reducing the grade of punishment in cases of treason from death to such a speculative punishment as some jury might figure out?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The object of the introducer of the bill—I can not say what was the object of the committee in reporting it, but the object of the introducer of the bill was that persons ought to be punished for the crime of treason, and taking away the death penalty will enable courts to obtain convictions in proper cases and punish by life imprisonment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly they ought to be.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. As that crime has not been committed in the United States, as shown by a single successful trial, in ninety years, he thought it wise to abolish the death penalty and see if we could secure convictions which it has been impossible to secure under the law as it stands.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If this bill passes and that provision shall be retained in it, will there be a civilized country on the earth except the United States that puts the penalty of treason at a punishment less than death?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir; many of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What are they?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Examine Report 108, commencing on page 10, and going through pages 11 and 12, you will find 35 different countries report the offenses for which life is forfeited, and you will see that the United States has about ten times as many as prescribed in any other country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How many revolutions have taken place in these countries?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Those that have the fewest offenses for which the death penalty is enacted have been most exempt.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Which has the most revolutions?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Russia abolished capital punishment as to all ordinary nonpolitical offenses in 1753. The abolition has not caused any increase in the number of these offenses. While there have been a great many offenses against the Government for which the death penalty has been inflicted, yet the revocation of the law affixing the penalty of death for minor offenses seems to have had the effect of decreasing the number of such crimes, and we have more than twenty times as many murders in the United States as Russia in proportion to population.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, there is no question that unduly severe penalties for crime have a brutalizing effect upon the human mind and heart. We aim to protect society from the acts of the criminal classes and inflict a punishment that will deter men from engaging in criminal pursuits. Still experience teaches that the true road to reformation is by education. Get the heart right and make the mind intelligent and crime will decrease, but brutalize men by law or familiarize men with deeds of blood under sanction of law and moral darkness will pervade the land.

Mr. Chairman, I understood my colleague on the committee, Colonel HENDERSON, desired to ask a question a few moments ago when he rose.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; I rose to ask that we proceed under the five-minute rule as soon as you have concluded.

Mr. RAY. I am through now, except to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the Committee on the Judiciary firmly believe that if we lessen the punishment for many of the crimes now punishable by death convictions will be surer, the triumph of justice more certain, and the protection of society be more certain. No mistake will be made in adopting this measure. The world is moving, and let us keep step with the most advanced of our people.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now ask that the general debate be closed and we proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BRUMM. Before that I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

As I understand the bill, of course I have not examined it very critically, but it is claimed to be a practical subdivision of the crime of murder similar to that which exists in most of the States—that is, murder in the first and second degree and manslaughter. Now, I fail to see it exactly in that way, and wish to know whether under the bill you can find a person guilty of any other crime than that of murder, because you are practically limited to the common-law definition of murder, and, being limited to the common-law definition, whether you do not leave the question of distinction between murder in the first and second degree and manslaughter entirely to the juryman, who of course is a layman? Is that not true?

Mr. RAY. That is substantially the law now, but that is not the effect of the bill. Neither does the bill attempt to define murder or separate it into two degrees. What I said or intended to say was that practically it will have the same effect in the administration of justice as though we, by statute, divided murder into two degrees, murder in the first and second degree. As, for instance, a man has been guilty of homicide without justification, thereby constituting murder; he is indicted for murder, and if convicted by the jury, he must suffer the death penalty; and only one of two results is possible in the indictment: He must either be convicted or acquitted. Now, a portion of the jury believe him guilty of murder, another portion believe that he is not guilty of murder though he is guilty of a lesser offense, but if the verdict of the jury was one of guilt he would necessarily have to suffer the death penalty. Therefore the jury will hesitate to pronounce him guilty, and he will have no conviction; whereas if they had the power to say guilty, but without capital punishment, you would have a speedy conviction and justice would triumph. That is about the substance of what I wished to say to the House.

Mr. BRUMM. The point is this: Under your bill of course you meant to use, and did use, the broad term murder, and referred to portions of certain statutes, especially to section 5339, which in a certain sense does define certain kinds of crime; but if you pass this bill by reference to that section you destroy the statutory provision on the subject of murder and go back to the original or fundamental idea of murder as defined by the common law, which is a malicious killing of a reasonable creature.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. You can not get anything else through the Senate.

Mr. BRUMM. What I want to get at is this: Then you expect in all the courts, without a statutory provision, to make it a question before the jury of the ability of the different lawyers to give their judgments and to control the jury by their powers of eloquence or their thought on the subject, as to the fine distinctions in degrees?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No; we propose to take that away from the lawyers and leave it to the court.

Mr. BRUMM. Why, no; you give it to the jury.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The law makes that distinction now. And every man who defends a criminal——

Mr. BRUMM. You leave it to the jury to say whether there is premeditation; next, whether there is malice aforethought; next, as the law of murder would be in my State, whether it was committed while in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of arson, rape, robbery, or burglary. You allow all that to be left to the lawyers alone, take it all away from the court, and permit the jury alone to act practically as lawyers, as well as judges of the fact.

Mr. RAY. Not at all.

Mr. BRUMM. My judgment is that is giving entirely too much power to the jury, who are not supposed to be versed in the law.

Mr. RAY. Not at all. The gentleman falls into a serious and grave error when he takes any such grounds. I admit that when a man is indicted under a charge of murder, it is for the jury to say whether he is guilty or not guilty, under the charge of the court, after listening to the arguments of counsel. And now in all trials for all criminal offenses, after the lawyers have had their say and after the evidence has been heard and after the court has charged the jury as to the law, it is all left to the jury to say whether the man is guilty or not guilty.

Mr. BRUMM. Will you permit me right there? Where the law cuts the offense into two or three parts, is it not in that case for the judge to lay the law down to the jury and then for the jury to find the facts to fit one of those cases? But under your proposed bill you obliterate that and take it entirely out of the hands of the court to make the subdivisions and you leave it entirely with the lawyers and then to the jury to find out what shades of distinction there may be, taking the old common-law definition, which simply says that any malicious killing of a reasonable creature is murder.

Mr. RAY. Not at all. Suppose we had written upon the statute books of the United States a definition of murder in the first degree and a definition of murder in the second degree. Suppose we had said that murder in the first degree consisted of the unjustifiable killing of a human being with deliberation and premeditation. Suppose that was the definition of murder in the first degree. Suppose the definition of murder in the second degree was the killing of a human being under precisely the same circumstances and surroundings, but with an absence of premeditation or deliberation. Of course I assume that the murder is not committed while the person is engaged in the commission of a felony. Suppose those were the distinctions. After the evidence was all before the jury, the court would say: "Gentlemen, here are the two definitions of murder. If you find that there was premeditation and deliberation you will say, 'Guilty of murder in the first degree,' and in that event the punishment is death. On the other hand, if you find there was no premeditation and no deliberation, then you will find the prisoner guilty of murder in the second degree, and in that event the punishment is imprisonment for life." He still leaves it for the jury to say, and the jury must say, for they are the final arbiters in the matter, whether there was deliberation and premeditation or not. If they find that there was, then it would be murder in the first degree, if all are of that mind. If they are not all of that mind, and if they are all of the other mind, that there was an absence of those two essential elements, then they will say, "Guilty of murder in the second degree." But if they are unable to agree, if they are unable to get their minds together, there might be a compromise verdict, and they all might agree that it was murder in the second degree. That is, those stickling for murder in the first degree would give way, and you would have a conviction and the triumph of the law.

Mr. BRUMM. Then, as I understand you, if what you say is correct, all the statutory laws that the different States of the Union have passed amending and changing the common law are of no use. They amount to nothing. Is not that correct under your proposition?

Mr. RAY. The gentleman falls into the serious error of supposing that we are endeavoring here to change the law of the various States regarding murder and manslaughter.

Mr. BRUMM. Not with reference to the States, but you are relegating it back to the common-law definition of murder alone.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That is the law now. The common-law definition of murder is the definition of murder in the United States courts.

Mr. BRUMM. I do not care what it is. There are, as I understand, subdivisions and definitions to a certain extent.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Not a bit.

Mr. BRUMM. Unless you can improve the law as it is now, there is no reason why you should pass this law. In other words, why do you not introduce a bill here specifically subdividing the degrees, and settle it upon that point? That is the whole point.

Mr. RAY. Now, let me answer the gentleman, and let the gentleman from Pennsylvania open his ears and awaken his intellect to a comprehension of the fact I state, for I have already stated it three several times and other gentlemen of the committee have stated the same thing. I want to say here that it is the duty of gentlemen who belong to this House not only to be in their places but to listen to what is being said when a bill is under consideration. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is usually in that attitude, but to-day he has been a little bit off. Here is the answer already made to the question which he has propounded: The Committee on the Judiciary in the Fifty-second Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary in the Fifty-third Congress, and the Committee on the Judiciary in the Fifty-fourth Congress in the House each believed that we ought to pass an act amending the statutes of the United States defining and providing the punishment of the crime of murder, and the most of us believe that we ought to divide that crime into two degrees, also defining and providing punishment for the crime of manslaughter.

In the last Congress we did pass a bill which defined murder and manslaughter, and which pointed out the various degrees of murder and of manslaughter. That bill went through this House and went over to the Senate of the United States, a very able body of very intelligent men. It has but one superior on the face of the earth, and that is the House of Representatives, the representatives of the people as assembled in the Fifty-fourth Congress. The Senate disagreed with us. It did not come up to our line of intelligence, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. The Senate refused to concur in our action. They thought we were going too far. For that reason the Committee on the Judiciary in the Fifty-fourth Congress was willing to compromise. We were willing to go one step at a time. We were willing to get this bill. Under the provisions of this bill, when a man is indicted for the crime of murder and a conviction is had, the bill permits the jury to say, if the offense is not of that heinous nature or character that the person should be executed, it permits them to say that he is guilty but shall not suffer capital punishment, and in that event he is imprisoned in a State prison for life.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, if the gentleman will just permit me there.

Mr. RAY. That is the object, and that is the answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. BRUMM. That is what I have heard the gentleman say before, and I assure the gentleman I understand it thoroughly. But it simply resolves itself into this, that the Senate was opposed to a subdivision of crime.

Mr. RAY. No.

Mr. BRUMM. One minute. They are opposed to a subdivision of the definition of crime, and because they voted down a practical and sensible proposition you are going to take an impracticable and unsensible proposition and pass it through this House. In other words, you are trying to get from results to methods. I do not believe that the Senate would agree to that any more than they did to the other.

Mr. RAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Senate will agree to this, because this bill as now drawn is substantially in accordance with the suggestion of the Senate, and is substantially the bill proposed or suggested by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That committee reported the exact language of this bill as a substitute for the House bill of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. RAY. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this bill is not a bill that aims at methods and not results. It aims at both. It is perfectly competent in all States of the Union, and it ought to be competent in all courts of the United States, for the jury to say, after they have heard the evidence, after they have listened to the arguments of counsel, after they have heard the charge of the court as to the law, if they find the man guilty, whether he shall be hanged, electrocuted, drawn and quartered and his body given over to some doctor to be dissected, or whether he shall be imprisoned for life.

I believe that the day will come when capital punishment will be abolished; but it has not come yet. The time is not fully ripe for it. But you will have imprisonment for life in any event; a punishment that is as severe, and, as I believe, a more severe and effectual punishment; one having a tendency to produce good order in society and serve humanity better than the punishment of death; a punishment that will protect society from the offender if he is found guilty. This punishment will insure conviction in hundreds of cases where criminals now go scot-free, and as the district attorney from the West says—where is he from?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. From the eastern district of Texas.

Mr. RAY. And as the district attorney for the eastern district of Texas says, it will lead to conviction in dozens of cases of indictment where it is now useless to bring the criminals to trial, because under the law as it stands they are sure to go scot-free; and he says that if this bill becomes law he can safely put these criminals on trial with a certainty of securing conviction in at least eight-tenths of these cases. Letters are coming from all over the land showing the wisdom of enacting this bill into law.

Mr. BARRETT. Will the gentleman permit another question on the same line?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. BARRETT. I have heard the argument of the gentleman as to cases of murder in the Indian Territory and other unsettled regions of this country, but I would like to ask him the question whether or not, if this bill becomes law, the punishment of the death penalty will be abolished for being accessories before the fact to murder, to conspiracy, to treason, to piracy under the law of nations, to murder on the high seas, to hostilities against the United States, to piracy by subjects, citizens, of foreign States, the rescue of prisoners going to or from execution, for any of these offenses, and if this death penalty shall be abolished for these crimes, I would like to ask the gentleman to explain whether it has been by reason of the fact of a failure to enforce the law against piracy, treason, for being accessory before the fact to any of the high crimes to which I have alluded?

Mr. RAY. With the gentleman's permission, my time having expired, I will yield to my colleague from New York [Mr. CURTIS] to answer that question, because he will do it much better than I can, having studied the facts in detail and being thoroughly posted in statistics.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman very briefly. The penalty of death is taken away from those offenses for the sole purpose of securing convictions, which in many cases it has been found difficult to do under existing law. I give way now to my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to move to close the debate.

Mr. BARRETT. I trust the gentleman will not give way quite so soon, because he has made an answer that is not satisfactory.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I fear I can not satisfy the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have tried to answer his question.

Mr. BARRETT. I want to ask the gentleman whether there has been any difficulty in enforcing the law against the crime of piracy?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. There has not been a trial for ninety years, and the last one was a failure.

Mr. BARRETT. I want to ask the gentleman whether there has been any difficulty in enforcing the law against the crime of murder upon the high seas?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. There has not been a trial for murder upon the high seas for a long period.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, that seems to me to be begging the question. I asked the gentleman whether or not from his great legal knowledge he can state that it has been found difficult or impossible to convict men of the crime of murder on the high seas.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. These trials were a long time ago, but the crime of murder wherever committed under the Federal jurisdiction is here provided for as a crime of which the penalty shall be death, unless the jury find "without capital punishment."

Mr. BARRETT. Has there been any difficulty in convicting persons who have been accessories before the fact in cases of murder and piracy?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The answer I have made is a complete one to all the inquiries the gentleman from Massachusetts makes.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman to tell me that the crime of being accessory before the fact is the same crime as murder. Do I understand him correctly?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARRETT. I have personal knowledge of a case in New Hampshire, within twenty years, where the supreme court of that State expressly decided that the crime of being accessory to a murder before the fact was not the same as the crime of murder. The man was tried first for murder and acquitted, and then he was brought to the bar charged with being an accessory to murder. It was claimed for the defense that he could not twice be put in jeopardy for the same offense, but it was held by the court that the offense was not the same.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. My friend has failed to distinguish between a State statute and a Federal statute. We are governed here not by the statutes of New Hampshire or of any other State, but by the statutes of the United States. Therefore in this legislation we are not infringing upon the rights of New Hampshire, nor do the decisions of her courts or the provisions of her statutes furnish precedents to be cited in Congress respecting a Federal statute. I hope my friend will recognize the distinction between the Federal Government and the governments of the several States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be closed and that we proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder or of rape under section 5339 or 5345, Revised Statutes, the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto "without capital punishment"; and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take up any more of the time of the committee, but there is one suggestion that I desire to make. I shall not move to insert the crime of treason in this section, but I wish that it could be done with the consent of the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] has, with wonderful pains and industry, presented us a most valuable table of information and has done work which it would take an ordinary lawyer almost a year to do.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Ten of them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But I want to point out to the committee that the suggestion made by the gentleman in regard to the omission of the crime of treason will hardly be justified in the light of the particular countries that have omitted that crime from the catalogue of death penalties. I want to read the names of the countries that do not punish treason by death, for I think this list presents quite an interesting study: Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Italy, Peru, Siam, Switzerland, and Venezuela.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. And Russia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Not at all; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Russia has abolished the death penalty as to all nonpolitical offenses.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But treason is a political offense.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will in a moment.

Now Switzerland, one of the countries included in the list I have just named, has a stable government—one of the most enlightened and liberal democracies on the face of the earth. Why she has a stable government may be a matter of discussion. It may be on account of the great patriotism of her splendid people. It may be that her geographical position has had much to do with it. Switzerland alone of all these countries that have abolished the death penalty for treason has a stable government. Many of the others have their annual or semiannual or biennial or quadrennial revolutions. There is Brazil with her rotating government; I trust that now under a republic the Government may be more permanent. Then there are Peru, Siam (I know little or nothing about Siam), Venezuela, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala—these are the countries that have abolished capital punishment for treason. It seems to me that is a warning to us. All the great civilized nations of the world, aside from these Spanish-American Republics——

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The gentleman forgets Italy and Portugal and Belgium and Holland.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Holland has not abolished the death penalty.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes; totally.
Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not so appear in this list.
Mr. CURTIS of New York. It is in the list.
Mr. GROSVENOR. If it is I stand corrected. Italy is not a Government that I want to point to as a model.
Mr. CURTIS of New York. She has abolished the death penalty only recently. If she had done it fifty years ago she might be a model.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Italy is a country for which I have much admiration. "Free Italy" presents to the world the spectacle of a nation struggling from under a domination worse than slavery—cultivating patriotism, love of country, pride in country. But beyond Italy and Switzerland you can not find a country other than these Spanish-American Republics that does not declare the highest penalty known to human justice against the man who strikes the blow of treason against his Government.
Mr. RAY. May I ask the gentleman a question?
Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly.
Mr. RAY. Spain punishes treason with death. The struggling patriots in Cuba are in arms against their lawful Government—we believe for good cause—because of oppression. Would the gentleman, under the circumstances in which those patriots stand, like to see every one of them, if caught, hanged or shot?
Mr. GROSVENOR. It does not become our Government to compare Cuban patriots to persons guilty of treason. Our historical record that a rebellion may grow to such proportions that it ceases to be treason settles the question of the Cuban patriot in his favor.
Mr. RAY. What is the distinction?
Mr. GROSVENOR. I am not here to discuss the distinction. By our Constitution treason against the United States consists of "levying war against the United States or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." But there is a dividing line that we all understand between the plotting traitor to his country and the brave revolutionist, if you please, who boldly takes up arms. And in case of unsuccessful rebellion or attempted revolution it is always a question of discretion, of political policy, afterwards with the Government whether the offense shall be treated as treason or as something else.
But to say that our Government shall be powerless to strike with death the plotting traitor is a proposition the propriety of which seems to my mind doubtful. I submit that question to this Committee of the Whole. I would not oppose this bill on that ground if in the judgment of the committee the provision ought to be retained; but when I heard the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], formerly the chairman of this great committee, say that in his judgment treason ought to have been left in this bill as one of the offenses punishable with death, I agreed with him, and I shall continue to do so unless I am overruled by the higher judgment of this House.
Mr. CURTIS of New York. One word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio; for I do not wish to detain the House, as I am anxious we shall come to a vote. There has been no trial for treason in the United States since that of Aaron Burr (who was not convicted), except one or two trials which were had in the Western States during the late war, and which were unsuccessful.
Mr. GROSVENOR. There has not been a trial for more than fifty years for murder on the high seas; but is that any answer to the argument? That is the reason perhaps why we have not had any more of them.
But the gentleman from New York is mistaken in his assumption. As deputy United States marshal in June, 1861, I myself impaneled men to try an indictment for treason against the Government of the United States. The case failed upon proof before the jury, but not because of an indisposition to inflict punishment on the part of the jury.
Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the statute which the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] read about punishment after death and the dissection of executed criminals reminded me of what I had read of one of the States—I do not now recall which—where the law provided that no medical student should become a practitioner until he had gone through a course in dissection. Shortly after they passed a law that no body should be dissected except the body of an executed criminal, and then they passed a third law abolishing capital punishment. This, of course, made it rather difficult to increase the ranks of the medical profession and gave the old members a fine monopoly.
I agree entirely with what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has said about this law. I was one of the few members on the committee who opposed it. I thought that instead of this bill we ought to have a law defining degrees of murder, and as I understand the argument made for this bill instead of that one, as it has been expressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], it is not that, in his judgment, the pending bill is better than such a bill, but it is simply that the other could not pass the Senate; and so he says, although we have not here the best provision of law—because he admits that he prefers the other—let us pass this inferior one because we can get it through, while the other would fail.
Now, it seems to me, in the first place, that if we think that the other bill is best we ought to insist upon its enactment, and not yield and take something that is inferior or objectionable. I admit that his argument is in general good—that if you can not get all you want you should take what you can get—but it is irrelevant here. This case is just the reverse of that, because it is a case where we want but a little and yet are to be driven under compulsion to take more. To that I object.
What we here all seem to want is a definite grading of the crime of murder which will allow convictions and capital punishment at the right time and under proper circumstances; but I do not think that this law provides that, although it does go very far toward the total abolition of capital punishment. I have no doubt that that is the reason the humane mind of my friend from New York favors this bill, because it comes so near abolishing capital punishment, which he does not believe in.
This bill allows the jury to say whether they will ever apply capital punishment or not. In other words, it puts the burden on each particular juror to ask himself the question, "Shall I assume the responsibility of that man's hanging?" Under the other law, which defines the degrees of murder, that appeal does not come to each individual juror. It may, of course, by straining a point, be applied to him by adroit counsel; but the jury is to find out what degree of guilt the man is involved in according to law, and the juryman does not need to say, "I want that man hung or imprisoned," but simply, "I pronounce him guilty under the law and under the judge's instructions." I do not think that we should place the juror under the stress that this bill would involve unless we wish to entirely abolish capital punishment. Therefore I do not believe in this bill, but prefer the other, and think we are allowing ourselves to be driven to a step toward the abolition of capital punishment, and going further than we want to go—taking a step that we can not retrace—by the threat that the law we want can not be got through the Senate.
That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I claim that we should stand by the law that we do approve, and not pass this bill.
Mr. CURTIS of New York. If my friend will indulge me for a single illustration, I wish to refer him to a man who, in former ages, was regarded as the wisest of his time.
When the Athenians had suffered under the laws of Draco, they asked Solon to prepare for them a code of laws, and when they were completed they asked him, "Have you prepared for us the best laws which you could?" He replied, "No; I have not, but I have prepared the best laws that the Athenians are able to bear." We are precisely in that situation to-day, and I hope my friend from Boston, the modern Athens of America, will yield to the example of the men who made Athens so distinguished.
Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not, unfortunately, come from this "Athens of America," so that the argument of the gentleman from New York does not appeal to me as forcibly as it might otherwise.
I have admitted the force of the principle laid down by the gentleman from New York, that when we can not get all we want we must take what we can get, but the principle does not apply here, because we are not taking less than we want, but we are being urged to take more than we want and to go further than we want to go, and take a stand that we do not want to take, because another body says we shall not take and hold the little which we do want and which we believe in.
If it was the other way, the argument would hold. In the Senate, for instance, if they should be told, "No; the House will not agree to this practical abolition of capital punishment, but the House will agree to the law defining degrees of murder, which goes halfway toward abolishing capital punishment," there the argument would be pat, and there the argument ought to be made, and they ought to take part of what they want, not being able to get it all. They ought to be told, "Accept the House bill, which the House passed in two Congresses, defining the degrees of murder, even if it does not go as far as you would like"; but here we are being pushed farther than we ought to go, and I oppose it.
Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill is one of a great deal of importance, and that it ought not to be enacted simply out of compliment to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], who I understand has devoted a great many years of his life to the consideration of this subject, and who seems to have great anxiety to secure its passage. This bill proposes to remove capital punishment in all cases, practically, where there is complete, fair judicial examination, and to leave capital punishment in all that great multitude of cases where there is no examination of that kind, and in my judgment no proper tribunal to determine matters of such great importance as life or death. In all of those offenses known to the Articles of War, or the corresponding articles governing the Navy——
Mr. CURTIS of New York. We do not touch those at all.
Mr. HEPBURN. In all those cases, the gentleman leaves capital punishment and allows courts-martial to determine upon matters of that kind. Yet from the regularly and properly constituted courts he either wants to take away the power or else to impose new and confusing duties where they ought not to be imposed. To my mind one of the great objections to this bill is that, instead of allowing juries to determine a single question only, namely, the guilt or innocence of the party accused, the gentleman proposes to impose upon them another duty, that of determining the degree of punishment.

Now, I believe that juries, as a rule, are to be trusted, when you can present to them one single question. We must remember that the men who compose our juries are not accustomed to the determination of great questions like life and death; and wherever you perplex them by adding to the question they must determine you lessen the liability of accurate judgment. I should be willing to trust the jury with the question, "Is this party guilty or not guilty," and that is enough to submit to them; but you give to the attorneys the further opportunity of confusion by submitting this other question, after they have determined the primary one, of what shall be the measure of the punishment, and in that you go too far.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Will the gentleman give way for a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Does any trouble arise on this question in the State of Iowa?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think there does, and I have always been opposed to adding this other perplexing question to the duties of the jury.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Iowa has had the law since 1878; and 35 other States have the same law.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am perfectly willing to admit that, but while the jurisprudence of Iowa is a great improvement, in very many respects, upon the common law of two hundred years ago, yet I assume that it is not yet perfect. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has taught us the alarming fact that 10,500 murders were committed in the United States in 1895, and he proposes to take away from the sacredness and protection of life——

Mr. RAY. Just a moment. There were not 10,500 murders, but 10,500 homicides.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARRETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. LITTLE. I will yield the floor if it is desired to extend the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that human life is so sacred—that is, the life of the law-abiding citizen is so sacred—that it ought to have about it all the protection possible. I do not believe you are adding to its protection when you take away from the mind of the man who may be the culprit the fear of death; when you hold out to him the hope of pardon or of escape. In my own State, within a few days, a murderer who killed a guard in his attempt to escape after the robbery of a bank in broad daylight presented his petition to the legislature seeking for a recommendation to the governor for pardon, which recommendation he must have in that State. That recommendation came within a few votes of passing, and I think it is the second or third legislature that has been importuned in that way. This man has assumed conversion, has assumed an entire change of life. He has excited the sympathy of certain persons in the State; and everywhere weak-minded, kind-hearted people, who are misled, can always be relied upon after the passage of a few years to set at liberty and to give new lease of power for the commission of crime to any criminal, I care not how bloody-minded or bloody-handed he may be. Now, while that uncertainty is in the minds of men, when there is constantly before them the thought that pardon may occur and that their crimes will not meet with certain punishment, I believe that the law does not act as a sufficient deterrent. I believe it is wiser and safer to preserve the death penalty.

It is better, in my judgment, if the death penalty is not to be inflicted and another and lesser punishment is to be imposed, that it should be within the province of the court to determine that, rather than that the minds of the jury, when considering the question of guilty or not guilty, should be perplexed with that additional matter to determine. I believe this bill is all wrong; and I do not believe that the gentleman who spoke in its behalf a little while ago, the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], finds or can find a justification for it in the failure of another branch of Congress to engage with us in proper legislation. The primary idea with him is that through the provisions of this bill he is going to secure these degrees of crime through punishment that ought to be found in the definitions of the statute. I agree with him that there should be two degrees of murder—murder of the first and murder of the second degree—and that there should be two, possibly more, degrees of manslaughter, and there are other offenses that properly should have statutory degrees in their definition. But this is not the way to secure it; this is not the legitimate way to secure that legislation, and the fact that others will not do their duty does not justify this House in attempting in this roundabout, inefficient, uncertain way to seek to accomplish what gentlemen think will be to some extent a remedy.

Mr. LITTLE. I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 1:

"And in all other cases of conviction where any part of the punishment is imprisonment the jury trying the case shall fix the term of punishment, not to exceed the maximum limit prescribed by law."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to submit a few remarks upon this proposition. I desire to say, in the first place, that I favor the policy of this bill. I much prefer that the jury should use their own judgment as to whether a man should be hung or imprisoned for life. In other words, I am a sincere believer in the jury trial. I believe that 12 honest men gathered from the country, in criminal cases, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred will do justice. The amendment that I offer does not at all impinge upon the policy of this bill, but adds to it. The bill provides that in case of capital punishment the jury may say whether or not the punishment of death shall be enforced. The amendment I offer provides that in all cases where imprisonment is a part of the punishment the jury trying the case shall fix the amount of imprisonment, not beyond the maximum limit fixed in the statute. In other words, I undertake by this amendment to take out of the hands of all judges the imposition of the punishment that is fixed, and the extent of it, and place it in the hands of the jury trying the case.

Now, I do not know how it is with other gentlemen, but in the State that I have the honor in part to represent our juries fix the amount of punishment in all cases except capital, within the limits prescribed by the statute. It works well. They can readily judge of the facts, and their findings have almost universally been satisfactory. But when you come to the Federal courts, where the jury are said to be judges of the fact of guilt or innocence, they simply say guilty or not guilty, and the judge says whether it shall be one, ten, or fifteen years in the penitentiary, or whatever the legal limit is. As the juries are judges of the facts, I think they are also better judges of the quantum of the punishment. For instance, the law of manslaughter, as I remember, provides a punishment not to exceed seven years' imprisonment. The jury ought to be permitted to say whether in that particular case it should be five years or one year, or whatever in their judgment is just and proper. The punishment ought to be left to the discretion of the jury. I heartily approve, therefore, of this bill. I believe it ought to be the law all through the land in capital cases; that the juries, hearing the facts and having all the bearings of the cases before them, ought to be permitted to speak and say whether in a particular case it ought to be capital punishment or imprisonment. I think it ought to go even further and say what the imprisonment should be.

I tell you, gentlemen, we ought so far as we can to carry out the Constitution of the country, not only in the letter, but in the spirit, which guarantees to a citizen the right of trial by jury. I think that the jury ought to fix the extent of punishment and say what it shall be, and not let them, as they now do, merely say "yes" or "no" on the question of guilt. I would let them fix the punishment within the maximum; and let the facts be separated from the law and let the juries, the people of the country, settle what the punishment shall be. It has acted well in my State and has always been most satisfactory. It has been satisfactory to the law-abiding element of our land, and I would like to see this amendment adopted. I consider that it is in line with the spirit of the bill and in harmony with the constitutional right of trial by jury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the original bill is bad enough, but to add this amendment to it would make it a great deal worse. I have had considerable experience in criminal cases, and the great trouble with juries as a rule is that they have a disposition to compromise. After the verdict is rendered and you ascertain how the jury stood, you will find in nine cases out of ten that the verdict is a compromise verdict. The best way to get jurors to render a verdict on the facts is by putting them in a position where they can say, "We have nothing to do with the punishment; we have simply to find the facts; we eliminate from our consideration the consequences of our findings; we have simply straight work before us, to find out the fact, Is this man guilty or is he innocent?" Upon that basis the jury will come nearer to rendering a just verdict than any other. Here it is proposed to encumber these laymen with the double duty of ascertaining the fact and fixing the punishment. If you do it, the result will be that at least 50 per cent more of our criminals will go unpunished.

But there is another objection to this amendment. There ought to be some consistency and similarity in the punishments inflicted for the same offense when committed by different individuals.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What does the gentleman think would probably be the effect under this provision of trying a person charged with making moonshine whisky in some of the mountain districts of the South before a jury of his peers; what would the fine probably be? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. I can not answer that question, as I have had no experience in that kind of business, but if the jury had authority to fix the punishment I suppose their verdict would be regulated by the sentiment prevailing in the locality.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason which it seems to me is important in considering this question, the one I have already indicated, that in the punishment of crime one criminal ought to be punished the same as another, or as nearly as possible the same, where the offense is of the same grade. If a rich man commits larceny, he ought to receive the same punishment as a poor man who commits larceny. If a poor man commits larceny, he ought to receive no greater punishment than the rich man. But by this bill you propose to leave the determination of the punishment to the spasmodic impulse of the particular jury in each case. That jury, sitting only in that specific case, will be largely governed by the criminal that is before them. They may think in one case, "This fellow ought to have ten years," and perhaps the next jury, knowing nothing about the length of time for which the first man was sentenced, may fix a very short period of punishment in a similar case, and then the cry will go up in the community that this man had a long term of punishment for a certain offense, while the other man, for a like offense, had only a short term of punishment. Now, if you let the judge pass sentence in both cases, he will be far more likely to do justice by making the sentences consistent with each other. When a judge has passed a certain sentence upon Jack for stealing a pair of boots and Jim comes up before him for a like offense, the probability is that he will give him the same sentence. It is the experience of the judge that enables him to equalize sentences.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The judge may be influenced also by his talk with the criminal.

Mr. BRUMM. Yes; I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. The judge will ask the criminal "What have you to say why judgment should not be imposed upon you?" and he will take into consideration the explanation which the criminal makes. Under that system there is no such chance of unequal sentences; but this bill, with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, would be simply a farce. It would be much worse than the original bill.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon this amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The amendment was again read as above.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that amendment by striking out the word "law."

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I hope the whole amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose it is likely that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas will be agreed to. It leaves to the local juries all over the country the fixing of the penalty, and I take it that they would also have something to do with the rule of evidence. When I heard the amendment read, it reminded me of Hoyt's play, A Temperance Town, where the jury went out to try a liquor seller. It was up in Vermont, I believe. One of the items of evidence that had been offered on the trial was a bottle that had been rescued from the cellar of the liquor seller. The bottle was called "Exhibit A," and after the jury had been out for a considerable time the bailiff came in with the empty bottle and said to the court that the jury desired to have "Exhibit A" filled up again. [Laughter.] If this amendment should be adopted I take it as likely that in the moonshine-whisky regions of this country local opinion, as embodied in juries, would be found to be decidedly against the enforcement of the law.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the trial to which the gentleman has referred was in his own State of Ohio?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; it was located by the playwright in Vermont in a well-known temperance community. Of course he took care to locate the play where no such thing could happen. [Laughter.] I have seen 200 indictments in cases coming from a mountainous section of the country, not in Ohio, but in an adjoining region, and in that United States court the question for the jury was narrowed down very closely by the judge, so that it was simply the question, "Did this man make or sell this liquor?" But if you should let the jury say whether or not the accused should be punished, the outcome would depend, I imagine, very much upon the quality of "Exhibit A."

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that debate on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment be limited to three seconds.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I move to limit debate to three seconds on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The motion of Mr. HENDERSON was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LITTLE, it was rejected; there being—ayes 10, noes 58.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That except offenses mentioned in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, when a person is convicted of any offense to which the punishment of death is now specifically affixed by the laws of the United States, he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment of death, or a lesser punishment, in the discretion of the court, is affixed, the maximum punishment shall be imprisonment at hard labor for life.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I move to amend this section by inserting, after the word "sections," in line 1, the words "fifty-three hundred and thirty-two." This section is that which provides for the punishment of treason. It seems to me proper, I do not wish to argue the question, that treason should be excepted from the offenses for which the death penalty is by this bill abolished.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 47, noes 17.

Mr. BARRETT. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 6 to 11, the words "he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment of death, or a lesser punishment, in the discretion of the court, is affixed, the maximum punishment shall be imprisonment at hard labor for life," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto 'without capital punishment'; and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid, the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life."

Mr. BARRETT. I trust the committee will give attention to this amendment, which is designed to make this bill symmetrical and to accomplish the very object which my friend from New York [Mr. CURTIS] said that he wanted brought about. He has stated that in trials for murder or rape it should be within the power of the jury to decide whether capital punishment or imprisonment for life shall be inflicted. But when he comes down to treason and piracy and a number of other offenses equally criminal with murder and rape, and in my opinion more so than murder, he provides that the penalty shall not exceed imprisonment for life, and that the jury shall have no option of imposing capital punishment.

My amendment proposes that in all these cases, whether the offense be murder or rape, or whether it be treason or piracy or similar offenses, it shall be optional with the jury to decide whether the person convicted shall be executed or shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life. My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has already offered an amendment, which has been adopted, providing that for the crime of treason the punishment shall be death. The committee, in view of the general sentiment in that matter, wisely offered no serious objection. My amendment makes the provision general, so that where the offense is piracy or murder on the high seas or destroying a vessel or anything of that sort, it shall be within the option of the jury to declare whether the criminal shall be hanged or shall suffer imprisonment for life. There has been nothing in the arguments advanced here by any member of the committee to sustain the fine distinction which the bill undertakes to draw in favor of men who commit this class of crimes and against those who commit the crime of murder or rape. My amendment simply applies to all these different offenses the same provision in regard to punishment, giving to the jury in the second class of offenses the same option as this bill allows in respect to offenses of the first class.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does not my colleague [Mr. BARRETT] wish to retain in section 2 the words "and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment of death or a lesser punishment, in the discretion of the court, is affixed."

Mr. NORTHWAY. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], if adopted, simply kills the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The adoption of the amendment will be fatal to the bill.

Mr. BARRETT. This whole measure has to do with and intends to accomplish, in rather blind phraseology, the abolition of capital punishment.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment, if adopted, would simply destroy the bill; and I hope that those who favor the bill will vote it down.

Mr. BARRETT. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that this will destroy the bill. Yet for two hours I have sat here in my seat and the only discussion we have had with reference to the matter has been in regard to the crime of murder and the penalty as embodied in this bill.

This amendment is to make this section harmonize with the first section, which has been already adopted. The first section was passed just as the gentleman himself reported it.

I submit that the statement of the gentleman that the amendment destroys the bill is simply to becloud the House. Why not call it a bill to abolish capital punishment and have done with it?

The amendment was again reported.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BARRETT, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARRETT. If in order, Mr. Chairman, I desire to serve notice on the gentleman from New York now, so that he may understand the situation, that when this bill is reported to the House I shall move to recommit it with instructions to make the change which that amendment contemplated, so that the sections of the bill will be in harmony with each other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Section 3 of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the punishment of death prescribed for any offense specified by the statutes of the United States, except in sections 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, is hereby abolished, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add in line 3, section 3, page 2 of the bill the words "fifty-three hundred and thirty-two."

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The amendment is simply the corollary to one I offered, and which was adopted by the House, in the preceding section. Of course it is necessary in the second section to insert the exception of treason; it is also necessary in this section, and as the House adopted the other it will, I take it, also adopt this.

Mr. HENDERSON. In order to be logical with the first amendment adopted, I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct about the statement he makes.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall apply to or in any way affect any proceeding or indictment now found or pending or that may be found for any offense committed before the passage of this act, and all offenses committed before the passage of this act shall be punished under the laws then in force: Provided, That juries may return qualified verdicts in such cases according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, and the sentences shall be imposed as therein provided.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move now that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 878, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and as so amended that the bill do pass.

The question being taken on the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole, they were agreed to.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BARRETT. Is it in order now to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BARRETT. I desire to offer the amendment which is in the hands of the Clerk at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 6, after the words "United States," strike out "he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life; and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment is death, or a lesser punishment in the discretion of the court is affixed, the maximum punishment shall be imprisonment at hard labor for life," and insert in lieu thereof: "The jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto 'without capital punishment,' and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid" the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life.

Mr. TERRY. Is that the amendment which was offered by the gentleman in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BARRETT. It is.

Mr. TERRY. I understand that an amendment rejected in the Committee of the Whole is not in order in the House.

The SPEAKER. The House may differ with the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARRETT. The reason I again offer the amendment is, in brief, this: No objection has been made to it and no argument advanced against it, but it was submitted and the only argument raised was by the chairman of the committee, who called on his friends to "vote it down." I undertake to say that no argument can be made against it, for it puts the second section exactly in line with the first and fixes the punishment exactly, word for word, verbatim, as is fixed in the first section of the bill. The intention evidently is to abolish the death penalty for these offenses, but the issue may as well be freely understood.

If the first section is right—and the committee has advocated it—then this amendment ought to be adopted to the second section. The whole theory of this bill is this, as the chairman of the committee has stated, that it ought to be possible to give an option of punishment, either the death penalty or else imprisonment for life. That is put into the first section; but in this second section, as reported by the committee, the jury has not the option to inflict the death penalty for piracy, for being accessory to murder, for stealing a prisoner away on the way to execution, and for numerous other crimes that have been always punishable with death under the law of this country. The reason given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] for this whole law is that men can not be convicted when it is mandatory to inflict the death penalty, when there is no option of imprisonment for life. In the line of the report of the committee, I suggest that the second section may be made harmonious and that the punishment in the second section may be the same as in the first section. If the gentleman in charge of the bill can give any reason for the distinction that is made here, I may be convinced; but until he does, I submit to the House that it is entirely unwise to make the punishment different in the two sections, and to make the punishment different for those crimes which have always been considered of equal gravity, unless, as appears, it is simply a plan to abolish the death penalty.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move the previous question.

Mr. BARRETT. I ask the gentleman to yield for a moment. Is it not suggestive when a member gets up on this floor and offers an amendment which makes the punishment in the second section exactly as it is in the first section to have no explanation or answer vouchsafed, but a mere demand for the previous question?

Mr. PICKLER. They are different crimes.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The matter has been once discussed, Mr. Speaker, and that is the reason why I demand the previous question.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 60, noes 26.

Accordingly the previous question was ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the House should now adjourn, would this be the unfinished business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote to-night.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BARRETT) there were—ayes 29, noes 58.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] is disagreed to.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I think an amendment of this importance should not be decided by so small a number as are present on this floor. I do not like to raise the point of no quorum——

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] can call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after a pause). The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is disagreed to. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended by the Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 67, noes 23.

Mr. BARRETT. I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER (after counting the House). One hundred and twenty-eight gentlemen—not a quorum—are present.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers of the Army, together with a report from the president of the Mississippi River Commission in regard to the caving in of the west bank of the Mississippi River in front of Helena, Ark.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers of the Army, report of examination and survey of the waterways between Norfolk, Va., and the sounds of North Carolina—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 1480) to amend an act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 883); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CORLISS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred House bill No. 1675, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 7477) to provide for the registration of trade-marks on bottles, siphons, butts, hogsheads, barrels, half barrels, casks, half casks, quarter casks, kegs, boxes, tins, and other receptacles and vessels used in commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with the Indian tribes, or among or in the Territories of the United States, or with or in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the fraudulent use of the same in such commerce, accompanied by a report (No. 884); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HULICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4452) to amend section 416 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 885); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar, and the bill (H. R. 2683) relating to the same subject was laid on the table.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred House concurrent resolution No. 20, reported in lieu thereof a concurrent resolution (House Con. Res. No. 32) to print 25,000 additional copies of Bureau of Education Circular of Information No. 200, being the catalogue of the American Literary Association Library, accompanied by a report (No. 888); which said concurrent resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the concurrent resolution of the House (House Con. Res. No. 30) to print 10,000 additional copies of the Report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 889); which said concurrent resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HERMANN, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 139) authorizing the immediate use of a portion of the unexpended balance of the appropriations heretofore made for construction of canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River in construction of protection wall necessary to the opening of said canal and locks to navigation, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 890); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. UPDEGRAFF, from the Committee on the Judiciary: The bill (H. R. 6739) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy. (Report No. 886.)

By Mr. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4655) granting a pension to Frederica A. Driscol. (Report No. 887.)

By Mr. HUTCHESON, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 2029) for the relief of the widow of George C. Foulk, deceased. (Report No. 892.)

By Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 3683) to reimburse George W. McKinsey, postmaster at Kokomo, Ind., for money paid out by him as said postmaster. (Report No. 891.)

The bill (H. R. 4541) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Walter B. Chester. (Report No. 893.)

PUNISHMENT OF INDIANS FOR RAPE.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill. The bill is reported in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, so that it will take its first reading now. I ask for its present consideration.

The bill (S. 2609) to amend chapter 341, section 9, of the acts of 1885, so far as the same prescribes the punishment of death for Indians committing the offense of rape, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any Indian who shall commit the offense of rape within the limits of any Indian reservation shall be punished by imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RED RIVER BRIDGE AT ALEXANDRIA, LA.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1725) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River at the city of Alexandria, La.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, after the word "River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation"; so as to read:

That the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at the city of Alexandria, in the State of Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 10, after the word "telegraph," to insert "and telephone."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the bridge herein authorized to be constructed shall be so kept and managed by the company owning or operating it as to afford proper ways and means for the passage through or under it of vessels, barges, or rafts at all times, both by day and by night; and there shall be displayed on said bridge, from sunset to sunrise, such lights and signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 4 the following words:

Or, in case of disagreement, upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in interest.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same and the approaches thereto upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use, or, in case of disagreement, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 7, after the word "location," to insert "prepared with reference to a known datum plane, upon prescribed scale, furnished by the engineer officer having supervision of said river, and"; in line 10, after the word "of," to strike out "1 mile" and insert "2 miles," and in line 11, after the word "and," to strike out "1 mile" and insert "2 miles"; so as to read:

That the bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of said bridge and a map of the location, prepared with reference to a known datum plane, upon prescribed scale, furnished by the engineer officer having supervision of said river, and giving for the space of 2 miles above and 2 miles below the proposed location of the bridge the topography of the banks of the river, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IRVING W. STANTON.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 923) for the relief of Irving W. Stanton, to report it favorably without amendment, and submit a report thereon. This is a little claim of only $176.95. It is approved by the Department of the Interior and the claimant has waited since 1868 for it. I ask unanimous consent to put the bill upon its passage at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Irving W. Stanton, of Pueblo, Colo., $176.95, this sum being due to him as compensation for his services as register of the land office at Central City, Colo., from September 30, 1868, to November 14, 1868.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT STREET-CAR SERVICE.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The bill (S. 2610) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the use of one-horse cars within the limits of the city of Washington after the 1st day of January, 1893, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1892, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to prohibit the use of one-horse cars within the limits of the city of Washington after the 1st day of January, 1893, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the proviso, as follows: "Provided, This act shall not apply to any company operating street railways outside the city of Washington or through unimproved and sparsely settled sections of the same, until such time as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall deem necessary for the public needs."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. The bill comes from the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I report it from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. HANSBROUGH), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives and one other member of the Joint Committee on the Library, to be selected by the two chairmen aforesaid, be, and they are hereby, constituted a subcommittee, with authority to sit during the recess of Congress, for the purpose of inquiring into the condition of the Congressional Library and the Botanic Garden, and to report upon the same at the next session of Congress, with such recommendations as may be deemed advisable; also to report a plan for the organization, custody, and management of the new Library building and the Congressional Library and the Botanic Garden; that the said subcommittee is also authorized to employ a stenographer whenever necessary during the course of the inquiry; that the necessary expenses of the sittings of the subcommittee, including the pay of the stenographer, be taken equally from the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. When I offered the resolution in behalf of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] I did not observe that it carries an appropriation from the contingent fund. I ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be so referred.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the joint resolution which I introduced yesterday be laid before the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. At the conclusion of the routine morning business I intended to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill. However, it has been brought to my attention that the honorable Senator from Texas had given notice of his purpose to address the Senate this morning. I do not desire to interfere with that arrangement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Texas, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 109) directing the President of the United States to request the Government of Spain to grant to the people of Cuba the power of local self-government, and in case the Government of Spain shall refuse, to take possession of the Island of Cuba and hold it until its inhabitants can institute such local government as they may wish and organize and arm such forces as may be necessary to support it.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby directed to request the Government of Spain to authorize the people of Cuba, subject to the sovereignty of Spain, to institute such local government as they may wish, and invest it with such powers as they may think necessary to secure to the people of Cuba the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

SEC. 2. That in case Spain shall refuse to grant to the inhabitants of Cuba the rightful power of local self-government, then the President of the United States is hereby directed to take possession of the Island of Cuba with the military and naval forces of the United States, and hold the same until the people of Cuba can organize a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, and arm and equip such military forces as may be necessary to protect them from invasion.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I have been ready at all times during the present session to cast my vote for all the resolutions that have been presented to this body expressing sympathy for the oppressed people of Cuba, and favoring the granting of belligerent rights to them, and declaring the duty of the United States in a possible contingency to intervene in the conflict there pending. I have been ready to cast my vote for such resolutions, Mr. President, not because they met my views, not because I believed in all the statements contained in the resolutions. I have not believed that it was the duty of the people of the United States to maintain a strict neutrality in the controversy now pending in Cuba. I do not agree to the statement that the United States have not heretofore intervened in conflicts in this hemisphere. There are other utterances in the resolutions to which I have not given my assent. But taken all together they are steps, though short steps, in the line of march which it is the duty of the Government of the United States to take.

I have been somewhat astonished at the line of argumentation adopted with reference to the pending conflict in Cuba. I have heard many criticisms about the power and duty of the United States to grant belligerent rights to the revolutionists in Cuba. We have been treated to citations from international law to show that the insurrectionists in Cuba have not attained to a position which entitles them to be recognized as belligerents.

Mr. President, I shall not treat this question as one which demands from the people of the United States the recognition of the insurgents of Cuba as belligerents. The people of Cuba have far better rights, far stronger claims to the consideration of the American people than their recognition as belligerents. We do not stand in the same relation to the people of Cuba that we do to the people of Ireland. If Ireland were to-day in insurrection against the British Government, every heart in the United States would be in sympathy with her as they always have been. If the people of oppressed and destroyed Poland were to-day to rise in arms against the authorities that partitioned her territory, our sympathies would be with Poland. If Hungary were to rise again from the bloody dust into which she has been trampled by the heels of the House of Austria, every American citizen would send across the waters, as they did in 1848, warm and generous expressions of sympathy for them. But they would be beyond the reach of anything but sympathy. But the Island of Cuba does not stand in the same relation, nor do its people, as the people of Hungary or Poland or Ireland or Armenia do. If they do, the statesmanship of this country has been at fault for one hundred years.

Our fathers for a century have asserted and maintained that the people of the United States had rights in Cuba, rights not only in Cuba, but in every foot of soil in this hemisphere, and rights that they said they were ready not only to assert, but to maintain with the whole of the military and naval power of the Republic. We have never asserted that we had any rights in Ireland, in Hungary, in Poland, or anywhere in Europe, but we have asserted that we have a right in every square acre of land in this hemisphere, and the highest right, the right of self-preservation of our own household. We find this declaration of rights proclaimed away back in the beginning of our century. It has been stated here that Mr. Canning was the author of what is known as the Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine is as old as humanity. God was the author of the Monroe doctrine. When He made man He gave him a right to preserve his life and his liberty, and when men are associated together in states the nation and the states have the same rights that the individual has.

The man who owns a tract of land adjoining mine owns it from the center of the earth to the center of the sky. So the books all tell us. Yet if he builds a powder house upon his land I have a right to have it abated. If that land is so situated that an enemy can seize it at any time and imperil my life and the lives of my wife and my children, I have a right in every foot of that land for the preservation of a higher right than his right to the title and possession of his land.

In 1802 and 1803 Mr. Jefferson asserted to Spain that the people of the United States had a right to the navigation of the Mississippi River. At that time Spain owned all the soil on the western bank of the Mississippi River. She owned the east bank of the lower river back to the Floridas. Mr. Jefferson asserted that we had a right to traverse the Mississippi River from our own territory across the territory of Spain—a right that we would maintain by force if necessary, a right which Spain could not and should not take from us. Not only did he assert that we had a right to navigate the river out to the sea, but that we had a right of deposit at New Orleans, where the waters between the ocean and the river met, because he said the craft that navigated the river could not navigate the ocean and the craft that navigated the ocean could not navigate the river, and there must be a change of freight; that we were entitled to the facilities on the land of Spain, and if that land was subject to overflow we had a right to go to the highlands where the freight would be protected, and there to use such means as we thought proper to protect our property. He said our right to navigate the river through Spanish territory was an inherent right, and the right to navigate comprehended all the means that were necessary to its use; that the right of navigation would be useless without the deposit, so that passengers and freight could be exchanged from one vessel to another.

Prior to the year 1800, as I have said, Spain owned all the country afterwards known as Louisiana. In the year 1800 she transferred to Napoleon Bonaparte all that territory. Did she not have a right to do it? Was she not the sovereign of the soil? Most unquestionably she was. But when she conveyed that territory to Napoleon Bonaparte, and Mr. Jefferson learned of the fact, then being President, he told his minister to say to Napoleon Bonaparte: "You have assumed an attitude of defiance against this Government; you have taken a spot of soil that imperils the rights and liberties of the people of this country. We could have permitted that territory to remain in the possession of Spain; Spain could not threaten our peace, our power, nor the safety of our homes. That river and its tributaries drain three-fourths of our country; its branches go through that vast extent of country that was soon to be settled by millions of people. The power that holds the mouth of the Mississippi River is necessarily the enemy of the United States if it has strength enough to imperil our institutions," and he told the ambassador, Mr. Robert R. Livingston, to present these facts to the French Government. I will read from his letter. In a letter to Mr. Robert R. Livingston, April 18, 1802, in Paris, Mr. Jefferson says:

There is on the globe one single spot the possessor of which is our natural and habitual enemy. It is New Orleans, through which the produce of three-eighths of our territory must pass to market, and from its fertility it will ere long yield more than half of our whole produce, and contain more than half of our inhabitants. France, placing herself in that door, assumes to us the attitude of defiance. Spain might have retained it quietly for years. Her pacific disposition, her feeble state, would induce her to increase our facilities there, so that her possession of the place would be hardly felt by us, and it would not, perhaps, be very long before some circumstance might arise which might make the cession of it to us the price of something of more worth to her. Not so can it ever be in the hands of France. The impetuosity of her temper, the energy and restlessness of her character, placed in a point of eternal friction with us, and our character, which, though quiet and loving peace and the pursuit of wealth, is high-minded, despising wealth in competition with insult or injury, enterprising and energetic as any nation on earth—these circumstances render it impossible that France and the United States can continue long friends when they meet in so irritable a position. They, as well as we, must be blind if they do not see this; and we must be very improvident if we do not begin to make arrangements on that hypothesis. The day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence which is to restrain her forever within her low-water mark. It seals the union of two nations, who, in conjunction, can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation.

Why this strong protest against France that had acquired jurisdiction over that territory, that had acquired all the title, as strong a title as Spain could convey? She was the sole possessor and the sole owner of it before. Why this strong language if we had not a right even superior to the right of France, superior to the right of Spain, superior to the right of any power that could imperil our life as a nation?

Let us go on. He writes to Mr. Dupont, a very distinguished Frenchman who was here, and the friend of Mr. Jefferson, a man of influence in France and whom he made the bearer of this letter. He would not send so important a communication by mail through France, it might have been intercepted, but he writes to him what I shall read.

Mr. GRAY. What is the date?

Mr. MILLS. The letter to Mr. Livingston is dated April 18, 1802. The date of this letter to Mr. Dupont is April 25, 1802.

I wish you to be possessed of the subject—

Of which Mr. Jefferson was writing—

because you may be able to impress on the Government of France the inevitable consequences of their taking possession of Louisiana; and though, as I here mention, the cession of New Orleans and the Floridas to us would be a palliation, yet I believe it would be no more, and that this measure will cost France, and perhaps not very long hence, a war which will annihilate her on the ocean and place that element under the despotism of two nations, which I am not reconciled to, the more because my own would be one of them.

Again, Mr. Jefferson says to him in the same letter:

In Europe nothing but Europe is seen or supposed to have any right in the affairs of nations; but this little event of France's possessing herself of Louisiana, which is thrown in as nothing, as a mere makeweight in the general settlement of accounts—this speck which now appears as an almost invisible point in the horizon—is the embryo of a tornado which will burst on the countries on both sides of the Atlantic and involve in its effects their highest destinies. That it may yet be avoided is my sincere prayer; and if you can be the means of informing the wisdom of Bonaparte of all its consequences, you have deserved well of both countries.

Again he writes to Governor Monroe, whom he sent as ambassador extraordinary to act in conjunction with Mr. Livingston to try to settle this controversy:

If we can not by a purchase of the country insure to ourselves a course of perpetual peace and friendship with all nations, then, as war can not be distant, it behooves us immediately to be preparing for that course, without, however, hastening it; and it may be necessary (on your failure on the Continent) to cross the Channel.

Again, writing to Mr. Du Pont on February 1, 1803, speaking of the Mississippi River, for that is one of the points on which Mr. Jefferson asserted the right:

For the occlusion of the Mississippi is a state of things in which we can not exist. He (Monroe) goes, therefore, joined with Chancellor Livingston, to aid in the issue of a crisis the most important the United States have ever met since their independence and which is to decide their future character and career.

He uses that same language in his letter to President Monroe in 1823, that this is the most important subject the American people have ever considered since independence. One was to acquire it and the other to maintain it. Here is a question of such transcendent importance that the President of the United States in 1802 sends an envoy extraordinary to act in conjunction with the minister to France to impress upon Napoleon Bonaparte, then rapidly ascending toward the zenith of that splendor and fame which he afterwards acquired—a monarch who presided over a country whose arms were at that time shaking down all the thrones in Europe—and Jefferson tells him if he persists in asserting the claim to the mouth of the Mississippi River, we will unite with the British people and the British nation and join together and sweep him off the face of the ocean; and he tells his ambassador, "In case you fail on the Continent, cross the channel and go to London," to that London where the marriage ceremony was to be celebrated—it was at London that the agreement of marriage was to be made and signed—"go to London, make the agreement between Great Britain and ourselves, and if necessary we will sweep the French fleets off the oceans of the earth in order to maintain the right we asserted to the mouth of the Mississippi River, notwithstanding France had a perfect title to it."

But what does all this mean? Wherever there are rights there are duties. If it was our right to secure our people the free use of the Mississippi River it was our duty to do it. In 1823, Mr. Monroe informed the Holy Alliance that we would not permit any European power to interfere with the revolted Spanish provinces in this hemisphere. Why? Because our political institutions would be imperiled, and to secure the liberties of our people monarchies and large standing armies must be interdicted in this hemisphere. This hemisphere was dedicated by its people to liberty and representative government. Jefferson said the Spanish provinces had a right to be free, and we had the same right to aid them that "a strong man has to assist a weak one when assailed by a robber or a murderer."

Why did we in 1865 send an army to the Rio Grande? The Republic of Mexico had been invaded by a European army, its republican government was overthrown, and an Austrian Emperor had erected his throne upon the ruins. That act was an invasion of our rights as well as the rights of the Mexican people. And our army on the east bank of the Rio Grande was notice to all concerned that the empire was at an end in Mexico. This bold movement was not prompted by mere sympathy for the people of Mexico, but by a regard for our own rights and the safety of our own people.

Monarchies live, Mr. President, by large standing armies. They do not consult the will of the people; they rule by force. If, then, a monarchy could be established in Mexico at our doors, supported by a standing army strong enough to suppress the public will, we could only maintain our Government here by an army of equal or superior strength, and when the American people establish such an army to protect themselves against foreign invasion they abandon the whole of their institutions and adopt the idea of the governments of Europe—a government of force.

Why was it just the other day that the President of the United States, after having been for years trying to get the consent of England to negotiate the disputed question of boundary with the Republic of Venezuela, said when that proposition was declined, that we would resist the absorption of that territory by Great Britain with all the means at our disposal, and made every American heart throb in response to that declaration? Why did he do it? Was it because we wanted to embroil ourselves in a controversy about a strip of land in Venezuela? No, sir; but because the occupation of that territory might remotely affect the interests, the well-being, and the safety of the people of the United States.

Here at our doors is an island which our fathers called the key to the Gulf of Mexico. It locks and unlocks the door to that great inland sea, whose waters wash the shores of five of our States. Into its basin the Mississippi River and all its tributaries pour their accumulated floods. With that gulf open to the fleets of a great naval power, and its key in the hands of that power, not only would our immense commerce going down the Mississippi and gathered on the gulf shores be imperiled, but the lives and property of our people would be subjected to the same danger. Cuba is not only the key that locks and unlocks that door, but it is the fortress that defends it. Mr. Jefferson thought that our system of States was not complete without the addition of Cuba. He said "he had ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition that could ever be made" to our Union.

"The control," he said, "which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico and the country and isthmus bordering on it, as well as all those whose waters flow into it, would fill up the measure of our political well-being." His first interest was annexation; his second was the independence of Cuba; his third was that no country but Spain should ever acquire it. In writing to President Monroe in 1823, he said: "We will oppose with all our means the forcible interposition of any other power or auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext, and most especially their transfer to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way."

He was speaking of all the Spanish provinces in America, and the arguments applied with more force to Cuba than to all the rest together. Danger from European conquest of the extreme southern states of South America was only within the regions of possibility. Danger from the occupation of the northern states of South America or Central America was much more probable, but danger to us by such occupation of Cuba would be constant, imminent, and great. Therefore it has been the settled policy of our country, of all parties, at all times, that that all-important key should never pass out of the feeble hands of Spain to any other Government except that of the United States. Jefferson, Gallatin, Adams, Clay, Van Buren, Forsyth, Webster, Crittenden, Buchanan, and Marcy have all declared the same doctrine. Many of our statesmen have advocated its annexation, many have opposed it, but all have agreed as with one voice that it never should go from Spain to any power except the United States. We have made the world understand that we would resist the transfer of that island with the whole armed power of the United States. We have so held for a hundred years, and we are ready to-day to redeem that pledge if any European power thinks proper to put us to the test.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the point. If to protect our lives, our liberty, our institutions, our homes and families we have the right to control the destinies of the Island of Cuba, and if in the exercise of these rights we have fixed the destinies of the people of Cuba and delivered them forever into the hands of Spain, have we not assumed the duty of seeing that the lives, the liberties, the homes and families of Cuba are protected by Spain? We have denied to Cuba the right to better her condition by a change of connection. We claim the right for ourselves to institute such government as we may think most conducive to our happiness, but we deny that right to Cuba. If England should offer to take Cuba from under the despotism of Spain and give to her people the mild government she gives to Canada, we say, "You shall not go." If to-day the insurgents should abandon all hope of help from us and enter into negotiation with England and England should stipulate with them that they should have a home government, with legislative, executive, and judiciary branches chosen by the people of Cuba, with the power to lay and collect their own taxes, and that all her revenues should be expended at home, that England would only exercise the nominal sovereignty over Cuba that she does over Canada, do we not all know that the United States would forbid the contract and like a jailor stand at the door of the Spanish dungeon and bid poor Cuba go back to the companionship of her chains?

Mr. President, if we have kept Cuba from going to France, if we have kept Cuba from going to England—and we have—and no man is so blind as not to know that within the last one hundred years, if it had not been for the people of the United States asserting the superior right to control the destinies of that island, either England or France would have had it and given it a better government than it has, and yet we have stood still and said, "You shall not go." If we intend to keep them within the sovereignty of Spain, is it not our moral duty to protect them and see that they are not destroyed by the government into whose hands we commit them?

I say again that wherever there are rights there are corresponding duties, and I say the people of the United States owe it to the oppressed and downtrodden people of Cuba to say to Spain: "The time has come when you must take your heel off the necks of the people of Cuba. We are responsible for their slavery; we are responsible for the despotism in that island; we are responsible for every drop of blood that you shed; we are responsible for every dollar's worth of property that your mercenaries have stolen; our consciences and our character as a people are involved in this crime. Cuba has a right to appeal to us, and we intend that you shall give her just government."

Mr. President, we have passed through a great civil conflict. Why was it that the Northern people said that they could not submit longer to the continuance of slavery in the Southern States? Because it was in the compact in which they were involved. They said that they were as much responsible for slavery if they continued to support it as those who owned the slaves; that their consciences were aroused; and they continued the agitation until the conscience of the whole country was aroused, and slavery passed out of existence on this continent.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other day spoke of that great philosopher and statesman—the greatest, in my judgment, this or any other country has ever produced—who, when almost a boy, scarcely a beard on his face, entered the house of burgesses with a petition in his hands asking the Commonwealth of Virginia to manumit her slaves. I remember that that illustrious man from that day to the day of his death continued to plead for the same liberty to the African that he enjoyed. He believed that liberty was the birthright of every man. He said he trembled for his country when he remembered that God was just, that nothing was more certainly written in the Book of Fate than that the African was to be free. My friend [Mr. VEST] spoke of his prophecy about Cuba. I want to call your attention to another prophecy that had its fulfillment thirty years ago. Many long years ago, speaking of African slaves in the United States, he said:

> When the measure of their tears shall be full, when their groans shall have involved heaven itself in darkness, doubtless a God of justice will awaken to their distress, and by diffusing light and liberality among their oppressors, or, at length, by his exterminating thunder, manifest his attention to the things of this world, and that they are not left to the guidance of a blind fatality.

Mr. President, for forty years prior to 1860 the American mind was agitated and tossed by the fact that African slavery existed in the United States. Gradually the light entered the brains and quickened the consciences of thousands and millions of people that while they did not own or hold a slave and never had, yet they were associated under a compact that secured that institution. Their consciences thundered into their ears that they were responsible for the existence of slavery, and no compromises or evasions could acquit them of their participation in the guilt. Then the land was aroused, and the struggle went from the forum of debate to the forum of battle, and slavery passed away through a blood atonement.

Mr. President, the day will come when the American conscience will again be quickened. The day will come when this mighty people will see and feel that the guilt for the wrongs and oppressions of the people of Cuba is upon their hands and souls. When it comes, and come it will, and come it must, the nation will rouse itself like a strong man after sleep, and it will fill these seats with Senators and the seats of the other House with members who will say to Spain: "Give to these people just government, or we will."

What sort of government does Spain give to Cuba? The taxation imposed, not by the people of Cuba but by the people of Spain, takes from the people of Cuba nearly $50,000,000 a year. Have you stopped to inquire what a monstrous iniquity this is? The whole annual produce of all the labor in Cuba does not exceed two hundred and fifty millions, and one-fifth of that is taken every year by Spain. These immense exactions are extorted from the people of Cuba to pay the army that crushes out their life on the land and the navy that guards the shores so that no relief can come and no victim escape.

In a very able article in one of the leading papers of Texas I see the different items of expenditure given, and the sum total is $48,000,000 in one year; and yet there are comparatively no schools; 75 per cent of the entire population can neither read nor write. There are no roads, bridges, or ferries; no public buildings; nothing but despotism and desolation, and that by the authority of the United States! Besides the enormous and exhausting taxation, the plunder of the people is without a parallel in history. One of the prominent Spanish officers now in Cuba with a military command said in the Congress of Deputies, March 2, 1890, that the frauds, thefts, and misappropriations of money by the officers sent out from Spain to govern Cuba amounted to $40,000,000! Forty millions wrung from a million and a half of people is a monumental robbery. Taxes by duties on imports are levied in Spain for Cuba, and levied so as to enrich not the Cubans but the Spaniards in Spain. The tax on flour is levied enormously high to keep out the flour of the United States and compel Cubans to import Spanish flour, and on that was so high a duty that bread costs 25 cents a pound. And the starving people complain to us that bread is a luxury in Cuba, and yet we say that Cuba shall not leave Spain! Why should not the people of Cuba have a government of their own? Why should not the question of taxation be placed in the hands of the representatives of the people who pay the taxes?

For what did our fathers fight in 1776? One of our greatest statesmen has said that our Revolution was fought on a preamble. We had suffered no despotism. We declared that taxation and representation should go together. Such has been our fundamental principle ever since. The taxpayers, through their representatives, must vote the taxes under our Government. But under the despotic barbarism we have forced on the people of Cuba the amount of taxes is prescribed by the tax receiver. It was said here the other day that Cuba had 30 representatives in the Cortes of Spain, while Spain has 700 representatives. How are these 30 so-called representatives chosen? Twenty thousand Spanish merchants and manufacturers in Cuba elect 27 representatives, while 90,000 Cuban farmers elect 3 representatives, and several hundred thousand Cuban male adults are disfranchised. But if the Cuban people elected the whole 30, what protection would that give to Cuban taxpayers in a body of more than 700 Spanish representatives? What they require for their protection is a government of Cubans for Cuba. No power has the right to impose taxes on the people of Cuba but themselves. Spanish taxation for Cuba makes flour so dear that Cubans only consume 54 pounds per head per year, while Spanish taxation on the Spanish people in Spain is so light that in Spain the people consume 400 pounds per head per year. If the people wish to meet and humbly petition the military commander who has them in his keeping for more bread or for more mercy, they must first obtain a permit. Without it no meeting can be held, and even with it under the supervision of a deputy sent by the commander.

And we are guarding the brutal monsters while they are carrying on their iniquity.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, a few days ago I stated that fact on the floor of the Senate, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] retorted that this was a time of war. I want to ask the Senator from Texas if I was not correct when I said that in time of peace, and during the past ten years, for instance, the Cubans could not hold a public meeting without getting a permit from the Government and a Government officer being detailed, who had authority to suppress any meetings he pleased?

Mr. MILLS. And to disperse them when he pleased. That is the standing order, so I am informed by the representatives of the Cuban people. But if it is only during a time of war, what else has Cuba had for a hundred years? War is the normal condition of that island, and a condition that is imposed by the strong and powerful arm of the United States. How proud we must feel of the great Republic when we see her stand with the keys locking the dungeons in which the free people of Cuba are confined—a people who are not permitted, without the assent of the dictator, even to ask him for mercy.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate and the American people to some of the enormities committed by Spanish officials in their treatment of the people of Cuba. In the former revolution, from 1868 to 1878, the conduct of Spain was precisely what it is now. On the 4th of April, 1869, Valmaceda issued an order, from which I read the following items:

First. Every man from the age of 15 years and upward found out of his house who can not give a good reason for it will be shot.

Second. Every unoccupied house will be burned by the troops.

Third. Every house without a white flag, which is the signal that its inhabitants desire peace, will be reduced to ashes.

Women that are not living at their homes or at the houses of their relatives will be gathered either at the town of Jiguaini or in that of Bayamo, where food will be provided for them. Those who do not present themselves will be brought by force.

When Mr. Fish, our Secretary of State, read the brutal order he wrote to the Spanish minister at Washington, "In the interest of Christian civilization and common humanity, I hope that this document is a forgery." But it was not. It was genuine. This exterminating policy was continued, and in 1871 President Grant said to the same minister that the "atrocities" inflicted in Cuba had turned the whole country against Spain to such a degree that the people were scarcely capable of judging impartially any longer. But all such remonstrances were lost on Spain. One of her captains of volunteers says in one of his reports:

More than 300 spies and conspirators are shot monthly in this jurisdiction. Myself alone with my company have already killed 9, and I will never be weary of killing.

Another captain of volunteers reports:

We have captured 17, 13 of whom were shot outright. On dying, they shouted, "Hurrah for free Cuba! Hurrah for independence!" * * * On the following day we killed a Cuban officer and another man. Among the 13 we shot the first day were found three sons and their fathers; the fathers witnessed the execution of their sons without even changing color, and when their turn came they said they died for the independence of their country.

In a letter of one of the officers of the Spanish army he says:

Not a single Cuban will remain on this island, because we shoot all those we find in the fields, on their farms, and in every hovel. * * * We do not leave a creature alive where we pass, be it man or animal. If we find cows, we kill them; if horses, ditto; if hogs, ditto; men, women, or children, ditto. As to the houses, we burn them. So everyone receives what he deserves—the men with bullets, the animals with the bayonet. The island will remain a desert.

During that revolution a Spanish newspaper in Barcelona published the following proceedings of a military tribunal in Cuba:

General Staff of the Captain-Generalship of the Island of Cuba:

The court-martial sitting at this place on this day, with the object of examining and passing an opinion about the process against the civilian Jose Valder Nodorce, who uttered seditious words, has condemned him to six years' hard labor and with irons, and his excellency, in sharing the opinion of the auditor, has approved the judgment, but not without remarking his great mildness, because it is not in accord with regulations, codes, and existing laws, and for that reason he has ordered that the president and members of the military court be sent to a castle for two months as a punishment for it.

Published by order of his excellency.

Six years at hard labor for uttering seditious words was a punishment so mild that the court was sentenced to two months' confinement as a punishment for their clemency! And this almost within sight of our shores, and backed by the authority of the United States! I read another extract. It is given to the public by Mr. Quesada, the representative of the Cuban people here. He is a gentleman whose veracity is not questioned. Here is an incident of that war as related by him:

During the last war General Weyler did not distinguish himself by military exploits. As a soldier he was an obscure commander of a column. His operations were in the territories of Camaguey and Tunis. His reputation is based on his atrocities. "The dance at Guaimaro" is famous in Puerto Principe. He captured a number of ladies of the best society of this province. They were taken to the village of Guaimaro. Around a large bonfire in the center of the public square he placed the defenseless women. The ferocious hordes of negroes who composed the Fourth Company of his command were ordered to violently undress the prisoners. Then they played an African dance, and the unfortunate Cubans who refused to participate were whipped by Weyler himself!

"But even worse than the foregoing," he continued, "was the crime committed by Weyler on Senorita Romero. She was captured with her mother. Weyler ordered the latter to propose to her daughter the sacrifice to him of her honor and virtue. The distracted mother, under threats of death, entreated in vain with the young woman. Colonel Weyler offered this dilemma: The senorita must choose between him and the black soldiers of the already famous and sadly celebrated Fourth Company. Senorita Romero did not vacillate. She indignantly exclaimed: 'Between you, monster, and the Fourth Company I do not hesitate. Give me up to the Fourth Company!'" Can Mr. Dupuy de Lôme or Weyler deny this when Cruz solemnly declares: "In 1889, in a house at Nuevitas, thin and emaciated as a specter, her hair white, a complete wreck, an idiot, I saw the sad victim of that infamy!"

How proud we must be as American citizens to stand guard over that atrocious villain who is again in Cuba in his work of death and desolation, but who would not be there to-day if the United States would draw her sword, as it is her duty to do. If we will not permit England, France, or Germany to extricate these wretched and persecuted people from the clutches of Spain, our honor demands that we shall do it ourselves. With what lofty pride our American mothers, wives, and daughters must look upon the enrapturing scene of a Spanish bullfighter at the head of a horde of armed brigands demanding of a helpless, innocent girl to decide between her life and her honor! How their eyes must burn with unwonted brightness and their cheeks suffuse and glow with gratified pride when they look on Weyler, with the Stars and Stripes above his head and falling in rich folds around his shoulders, and the royal bird of Jove fanning his cheeks with the feathers of his outstretched wings, while he bids an innocent girl to choose between his and the embraces of his brutal minions. How proud must all our men be, sons of the sires who hung that standard in the storms of a hundred battles, who saw it ride in triumph on lands and lakes and oceans, and never once did the smell of the stain of dishonor rest within its folds, now see it guarding the wretch who slaughters unarmed men, violates unprotected women, and gives their homes to the flames and their flesh to the eagles. Oh Columbia, gem of the ocean, your children have boasted of their civilization, their freedom, their prowess. How is the mighty fallen, the strong staff broken and the beautiful rod! Columbia, the mighty God who called thee out of the deep, placed in your hands the burning brand to enlighten the world and lead its downtrodden humanity to higher and better altitudes. You were never intended for a jailer. Your fair waist was never designed to be encircled by the belt of a Spanish bullfighter, nor your fair hands to carry the keys of Spanish dungeons, where victims of despotism were loaded with chains because, taught by your precepts and example, they aspired to climb to the mountain tops where you stood.

Mr. President, I speak and feel as an American citizen. There is not a drop of Spanish blood in my veins. I speak for liberty, I speak for the right, and I feel and speak for the honor of my country. We hold Cuba in vassalage to Spain. For a hundred years we have declared, and reiterated the declaration, that Cuba shall stay under the dominion of Spain. We have shut in her face the door of hope for release from that despotism, and, having the responsibility which even an equitable right would give, we should demand of Spain that just government should be given to Cuba. If necessary we should enforce the demand with the whole military strength of the nation. Suppose the suffering people of Cuba should say to us: "You have forsaken us; we have appealed to you time and again. Every generation that has come from the womb has appealed to you, and gone down to the grave marked by Spanish blood and dishonor. So farewell; we are going now to appeal to England; she will give us the mild government she gives to Canada. She will let us govern ourselves in all our domestic affairs—she will let us raise what taxes we are willing to pay and expend our revenues on educating our children and building up our country, and protect us against invasion from Spain or any other power." What would be our response? What has for a century been our response? Columbia would come out with her mighty heart throbbing, her flags flying, and her drums beating, and answer in tones of thunder, "England shall not assume sovereign rights over one square foot of Cuba. We will see that Spain keeps Cuba against all the world except ourselves." Then if we have fixed the destiny of Cuba we owe it to our own honor, we owe it to humanity, to protect the wretched and misgoverned people of that island against Spanish barbarity.

The other day I read in the press dispatches from Cuba where a Spanish column, after having an engagement with the troops under Maceo's command, attacked a house where a father, a daughter, and an infant were sheltered. The father stepped out with his child in his arms and cried, "Stop firing; we are peaceful citizens"; but they drew nearer, took deadlier aim, shot to death the father and the child. The daughter sprang forward to protect her wounded father and to plead for her own life. The appeal was answered by shots from their rifles and thrusts from their bayonets, and the girl fell on the dead body of her father and brother, riddled with bullets and gashed with bayonets. This is the kind of government Spain is giving to Cuba. It is the protection that the hawk gives to the dove, the panther to the hind. And all this is by the authority of the United States! We stand guard over Spain while she tears Cuba limb from limb, while the victim is crying to us to deliver her from the jaws of the monster.

Mr. President, while thinking of the slaughter of this girl who attempted to save her father, there comes up in my mind the recollection of an incident that occurred in Alabama during our civil war. A colonel of an Ohio regiment was in command of a district in North Alabama within whose lines the family of a Confederate officer resided. Sometimes the bold rebel would slip through the lines undiscovered and visit his family. On one occasion he was discovered by some one more devoted to the Union than to his personal welfare. Information was given to the colonel commanding the district, who took a half dozen of his men and under cover of night went to the house to capture his Confederate foeman. Arriving at the house, he rushed in the door, pistol in hand, and found the Confederate soldier in the midst of his family, his pistol and belt lying upon the bureau and within reach of his daughter, a beautiful Confederate girl of 18 summers. In an instant she grasped her father's pistol to shoot in defense of her father's person. The coolnel sprang forward, seized the pistol in her hand to disarm her. Not being a Spaniard, it never entered his mind to shoot her. In the struggle her pistol fired, and she was shot through the hand, but her father succeeded in making his escape. The gallant officer returned in a few days to see about that wounded hand. He came again to express his profound regrets for that wound, and again and again to hope for its early recovery. He did not stop coming till he carried that hand off with him and clasped it in his. It is his hand now and has been for thirty years. Around that family hearthstone there stands a group of noble sons, half Yankee, half rebel, but all Americans. [Applause in the galleries.] We did not shoot women and children. We did not shoot prisoners in our great civil war.

Mr. President, in my own good State of Texas—a State that drank of the cup of Spanish barbarity to the dregs in its early history—there occurred during our civil war another incident that shows the difference between Spanish and Anglo-Saxon civilization. The Island of Galveston had been occupied by the troops of the United States, and the Harriet Lane, a United States man-of-war, laid at her wharf. The officer in command of the Department of Texas at Houston got one or two old steamboats that were laid up out of reach of the enemy, put cotton bales around them, and mounted on them such guns as he could procure, and moved down to attack the enemy's navy with his, and at the same time threw troops across the bridge on the island and attacked and captured the garrison; at the same time, with his improvised fleet, he attacked, boarded, and captured the Harriet Lane. Young Lea, the commander of the Harriet Lane, fought gallantly, and fell on the quarter deck of his vessel, vainly struggling to hold it. When the battle was over, we did not cut off his head and stick it on a pole and parade the streets with it as the Spaniards did their victims in Cuba. Gentle hands shrouded the young soldier. He was taken to the cemetery where the fathers of the city slept. His remains were followed to the grave by the whole people. His father read the burial service of the church to which they both belonged and into which the young officer had been baptized when a child in his father's arms. We laid him in a hero's grave, we covered him with flowers, flowers that were wet with the tears of kindred and friends, and left him alone in his glory. Never in that great conflict, where more than 2,000,000 of men were engaged for four years in the most desperate struggle that ever occurred in the annals of mankind, did either side ever commit one such act of cruelty as is now being enacted every day in Cuba.

Mr. President, this is the same old story. I could read you instance after instance of barbarism in Cuba; but it would be but the repetition of Spanish history—the same old story that we have heard from the days of Charles V, when the printing press came and light began to diffuse itself and knowledge began to be gathered and stored. Spain tried to crush it out and extinguish the light by military violence. You all remember the history of Luther, who began the Reformation by teaching the Germans that justification came by faith. Charles V had him summoned to Worms to answer to him for this mortal offense. He presided over that august assembly, then the most powerful monarch on the globe. He called on Luther to retract his heresies, which he refused to do, saying he would only retract when his judgment was convinced by reason.

We all remember the history of the poor Netherlands. They had recovered their land from the sea by building dikes, and the Spaniards overflowed their lands with blood as the sea had theretofore done by water. Finding it almost hopeless to contend against them and to save their country from the butchery, torture, and flame of the Spaniard, they stood upon the dikes, spade in hand, and said, "If you continue this persecution, if we can not live in this country, we will cut these dikes and bring back again the sea over us all, and, vanquished and victor, we will go together to the throne of God to plead our cause."

What was the history of Spain in her American provinces? Did her treatment of her subjects change? We were boys once; our heads are now gray; but I can remember when I was a boy reading a little poem and perhaps reciting it at school:

> When Cortez came with sword and flame,
> With one fell blow proud Mexico
> Was humbled in the dust.

Sword and flame! Not the flame of the intellect, not the flame of truth, not the flame of knowledge, not enlightenment and elevation of character, but the flame of fire that extinguishes and burns the fagots beneath the feet of victims.

She desolated Mexico under Cortez, Peru under Pizarro, and when, in vain, after a long tenure she found herself utterly incapable of holding those provinces, and when the United States stood with a brandished and flaming sword and said to all Europe, "You shall not interfere to help Spain recover them," then the whole power of her concentrated despotism fell upon poor Cuba. In 1825 an order or decree issued from the Government of Spain appointing a governor for Cuba and giving him all the powers of a governor of a besieged city. Martial law was given to Cuba in 1825, and martial law has been the inheritance of poor Cuba from 1825 to 1895. For threescore and ten years that prostrate island has been crushed, bleeding, starving, rising in insurrection, the people lifting their appeal to God to smile on their cause and give them deliverance, and appealing to the United States for help. And yet at every moment of that time we have stood upon the dark doorways to Spanish dungeons with American bayonets and American flags flying over them, refusing them succor, and yet holding them in subjection to Spain.

I say, sir, we have a duty, a holy duty, and if we think God will not call us to account for the manner in which we have refused to discharge that duty to those people, we must believe that there are crimes and sins that can be perpetrated in this world which can go without an atoning sacrifice. The blood of innocence and the demands of justice, as my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] said the other day, will speak after a while. He who sees the sparrow fall will open the eyes that never sleep. He will open the ears that are never deaf. He will treasure up the wrongs of Cuba and after a while—

> Eternal justice wakes, and in their turn
> The vanquished triumph and the victors mourn.

We have had something to do with Spanish history in the State of which I am a citizen and where I have lived since a boy. We have gone through all of this history. After 1824, when Mexico had achieved her independence and made her free constitution, copying closely that of the United States, a Spanish dictator, Santa Anna, trod that constitution beneath his feet. With his armed soldiery he marched over Mexico, beat down her armies—for he was a military genius—and not only captured them but butchered them, and not only butchered them but went to the cities that sympathized with the republican government of Mexico and butchered men, women, and children.

In 1836 he came to Texas on his mission of death. He came with a sword of flame, as Cortez had gone to Mexico in 1525, but he found a different kind of material from that with which Cortez had to contend. For a while fortune seemed to smile on him. He entered San Antonio and stormed and took the little garrison in the Alamo, and put to the sword every living thing within its walls except one woman and one little female child. They too would have been slain, but they were covered by the dead bodies of the soldiers who had fallen in defense of the garrison. True to Spanish instinct, Santa Anna went about among the bodies of the slain and sent his dagger to the hilt in the bosoms of its heroes. From San Antonio, flushed with victory, on the 6th of March, 1836, the invaders went to Goliad. On his way he encountered Fannin with a handful of brave men from Texas, Georgia, and Alabama. Though far inferior in number they challenged his advance, and beat him till their ammunition was exhausted, and then capitulated. They were to be sent back home to Georgia and Alabama. But on Sunday, the 27th of March, when the Sabbath bells were ringing all over the home land, when friends and loved ones in that home land were wending their way to their places of worship, the Spaniard was conducting his victims to the place of slaughter.

The little band under Shackelford were young men from Alabama. An old soldier of the Republic of Texas told me many years ago the story of that massacre as it was given to him by Shackelford himself. He said he was a practicing physician in Alabama, and determined to raise some men and go and help Texas. His son was in his party and his patrons and friends gave him their sons upon the condition that he would treat them as he treated his own son. He accepted the trust. When the battle was fought and lost, Shackelford, who was a skillful surgeon, attended the wounded Mexicans, and rendered to them valuable service. For this he was informed that he could have the life of his son; all the others would be shot. He went to his son and said: "I have accepted all your comrades upon the terms that I would treat each of them as I would treat my own son. Your comrades are ordered to be shot. Your life is offered to me, but I can not accept it without betraying my word. I will leave it to you to decide for yourself." The gallant young hero instantly spurned the proposition and said he would die with his comrades. They were all young men of education. Many of them played well upon musical instruments and all sang. Before the fatal order was executed they took their harps, violins, and flutes, some played and others sang that sad but soul-stirring song of John Howard Payne:

'Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home;
A charm from the skies seems to hallow us there,
Which sought through the world is ne'er met with elsewhere.

In a few moments more their voices were still and their harps were songless and silent. At last they were all at home—not the homes they had left in Alabama and Georgia, and to which the Spaniard had promised they should soon return, but they were at that far-away home "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

After the slaughter their bodies were gathered in funeral piles, covered with brush, and set on fire, and wolves and dogs and hogs fed upon such as the fire had failed to consume. On to the east the victors pushed their columns till on the 21st of April the last hope of Texas, an army of 783 men, stood with their back against the San Jacinto River. It was the last intrenchment of liberty, and that day was to decide whether it was to be the birth or burial of the Republic. To enter the arena where Texas awaited him he had to cross a stream spanned by a bridge which, when crossed, Houston had destroyed behind him, so that there was no escape for either army. Excelling Houston more than two to one, he was confident of victory, and as the sun passed the meridian he laid down to enjoy his siesta and dreams of ultimate victory and the slaughter of the vanquished. While he was sleeping, gently sleeping, the soft Southern winds passing over vast fields of flowers drank up their odors and poured their rich perfumes through his camp; the feathered choristers of brightest plumage sang in the branches of the evergreen oaks that bent over him. While he slept Houston moved cautiously among his devoted braves, told them the bridge was gone, then "Be men, be freemen, that your childen may praise their father's name. Remember the Alamo!" At 3 o'clock in the evening he moved forward to the battle. As he was advancing he told his musicians to play a piece that he named—a piece that he thought suitable to the occasion and in harmony with their feelings. If a Greek column had been moving against the invader who had driven them to their last intrenchment the song of the Argive warriors would have been:

Again to the battle, Achaians!
Our hearts bid the tyrants defiance!
Our land, the first garden of Liberty's tree,
It has been, and shall be, the land of the free.

But it was not a Greek army, and it was not a Greek song they sang. It was a Texan army, and a handful as brave as the bravest who fought with Themistocles at Salamis or fell with Leonidas at Thermopylæ.

If it had been a Scotch army marching to meet the tyrant who had invaded their homes and laid waste their fields, the song they sang would have been:

Scots, who have with Wallace bled,
Scots, whom Bruce has often led,
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to victory!

But they were not Scots, though as brave and as true as the best that won with Bruce at Bannockburn or lost with Wallace at Falkirk.

If it had been the Old Guard of France marching down into that vortex at Waterloo, where the concentrated fire of more than a hundred guns was plowing through their ranks, they would have sung:

Ye sons of France, awake to glory!
Hark! hark! what myriads bid you rise!
Your children, wives, and grandsires hoary,
Behold their tears and hear their cries!

To arms! to arms! ye brave!
The avenging sword unsheathe!
March on! march on! all hearts resolved
On victory or death!

But it was not a French army, nor the field of Waterloo. It was a Texan army, as brave, as determined, as patriotic as the gray-bearded grenadiers that carried the victorious lilies of France from the Pillars of Hercules on the west to the mountains of Judea on the east, and from the pyramids of Egypt on the south to the snow-covered steppes of Russia on the north. The occasion demanded not the sonorous blast of the trumpet, but the soft, sweet notes of the lute. The song they sang was a warm, cordial invitation:

Will you come to the bower I have shaded for you?
Your bed shall be roses all spangled with dew.

They came, and a great many of them are there yet. When the battle was over one-half of the enemy were dead on the field and the other prisoners begging for that mercy they never gave but received from those whose homes they had destroyed and whose comrades they had put to the sword. When the sun set on that eventful day and the stars began to light their lamps in the skies, lo! in the southwestern heavens there appeared one that moved forward till it stood over the field of San Jacinto and burned on with ever-increasing brilliancy as the representative of the newborn Republic of Texas.

Mr. President, when I came to Congress in 1873, twenty-three years ago, before I was sworn in I read the news of the capture of the steamer Virginius and the butchery of 53 of the persons taken on her decks. The vessel had been engaged in carrying arms and supplies to the insurrectionists in Cuba. She was regularly documented as a vessel of the United States. Over her decks floated the flag of the United States. Every one on the boat was entitled to the protection of the laws of the United States. She was run down on the high seas and captured by a Spanish armed vessel and carried into Santiago on the 3d of November, 1873. At 6 o'clock next morning four of her passengers were shot. An officer of the British schooner Brilliante, who witnessed the execution, says:

The executioners demanded that these victims should kneel and be shot in the back. Two of them so knelt and were so shot. The other two, Verona and Ryan, refused to kneel, and were thrown down and handcuffed while begging their executioners to let them die standing. A Spanish officer stepped forward and thrust his sword through Ryan's heart. Verona died easily. Then down upon the corpses, still warm with life, came the bloodthirsty mob, severing their heads from their bodies, placing them on pikes, and marching with them through the city.

Forty-nine others were shot to death on the 7th and 8th of November. And the great achievement was celebrated with bonfires and bullfights over the island. Ryan was a gallant Union soldier from New York. Frye, the captain of the vessel, was a Confederate from Louisiana. These 53 persons on the decks of an American vessel were tried at night before a military tribunal. They were not permitted to be present and defend themselves. They had violated no law of Spain. Reverdy Johnson, one of the ablest lawyers in the United States, said:

Her capture was as gross a disregard of the authority of the United States as if the Tornado had seized her in the harbor of New York. If he said the vessel had violated the neutrality laws of the United States, Spain could take no cognizance of it.

The United States alone could do that, but the United States did nothing but enter into a long diplomatic correspondence, and came out of the controversy covered with disgrace. Frye was refused permission to apply to the United States consul for the protection of the men on his boat. When they were marched to execution they were carried past the United States consul's office—his flag not even flying. He did not dare to put it up, and his doomed fellow-countrymen bowed their heads to the bare flagstaff and "waived a mournful good-bye."

After Captain Frye was condemned they for the first time permitted him to come before the military tribunal. He asked permission to go, not to plead for his life, but for the lives of some of his crew. In that appeal he says:

I do not come here to plead for my own life. You have condemned me. I do not ask you for my life.
It has been notorious—

He said—

that a great number of vessels were engaged in it [blockade running] during the American war, and notwithstanding many prizes were taken not a single life was sacrificed.

What a high tribute this is to the Union Army and to the Union people by a Confederate soldier! A citizen of Louisiana, a Confederate, says to the Spaniards:

The country against which I fought and the people against whom I fought, the country that triumphed over me, never perpetrated in one single instance what you do in every instance. On the contrary—the greater part of the prisoners were liberated after a short imprisonment.

He said—

Of the law in Cuba and the proclamation referring to the introduction of arms into Cuba I had not heard until the night of my conviction. If with superior opportunities I was ignorant of a case decided by other than international law, how completely ignorant should be these poor people? I was continually in the company of persons who ought to have known it, yet the fact was never once alluded to. In a word, I believe that they were ignorant, and that the world will be grievously surprised to know that their lives are sacrificed. The council well know that I am not pleading for my life; I have neither home nor country—a victim of war and persecution—I being shut out from the road to prosperity until I am unable to provide bread for my wife and seven children, who know what it is to suffer from the vicissitudes of my life. My life is one of suffering, and it is not for myself that I implore.

* * * * * * * *

Spaniards, as I believe I am the only one who will die in the embrace of our holy religion, consider the souls of these poor people. Give them time and opportunity to seek the mercy of God. Thus only can you comply with your duty, and my blood ought to be sufficient. These poor men had no knowledge of their crime.

Was not that a magnificent appeal to make? Heroic and noble, he refused to ask from those bloody butchers his own life. He had violated no law for which they could punish him, and, as he said, no one in our great conflict had ever been punished for running a blockade. The vessel would be condemned as a prize, the property would be taken, but the people that were on it would be treated as prisoners in civilized war.

But the Spaniards did not turn any loose. They butchered all of them, and now I have here something more I want to read to you. Our consul, when he found the boat had come in, interceded with the butcher Burriel. I perhaps ought to ask pardon from some of our people who think that I am too harsh in speaking of this "proud and sensitive people." Here was a butcher, and as soon as the vessel came in the American consul asked permission of Burriel to see his countrymen before anything was done. He sent a dispatch to the consul at Jamaica informing him of these facts, and Burriel, the general in command, suppressed it, and admits that he suppressed it, and would not permit it to go until those people were all tried and slaughtered. Here is what Burriel says in reply to that:

I have received your communications, one dated the 2d instant and the remaining two others the 3d instant; the first inquiring if it was true that a telegram had been detained by my orders, which you had addressed to the United States consul in Kingston, Jamaica, asking information as to the nationality of the steamer Virginius, seized on the high seas as a pirate by the Spanish war steamer Tornado. In my desire to correspond duly to the exquisite zeal which you show in this matter, I would have replied at once to your communication, but as I received it precisely at the moment of important and peremptory affairs, to which I had to devote myself exclusively; further, the past two days were holidays, upon which the officials do not come to the offices, being engaged, as well as everyone else, in the meditation of the divine mysteries of All Saints' and the commemoration of All Souls' days, as prescribed by our holy religion.

He could not listen to an appeal to save those souls when he was engaged in considering the mysteries of All Saints and the commemoration of All Souls. He could not listen to the appeal of a man who, refusing to ask for his own life, asked for the lives of those poor innocent men who were on his boat. He was engaged in considering the mysteries of All Saints and the commemoration of All Souls, when souls were being rushed into eternity by the shots of his guns and by the thrusts of his spears—fifty-three wallowing in their own blood.

What did the American people do about that? Everybody knows very well that Spain had no right to stop that vessel on the high seas. General Grant said so. General Grant's Cabinet said so in 1871 when the question was brought before them whether the people of the United States had not a right to ship arms and munitions of war to insurgents anywhere. It was a matter that was referred to the Cabinet. I have the letter. Here is what it says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, October 1, 1869.

TO FRANCIS DARR:

Your dispatch of to-day came while I was at a Cabinet meeting, and after I had brought before the President your letter on the same subject. After full consultation with the Cabinet, the President was of opinion that the shipment of arms was not prohibited to either party in the Cuban struggle. The revolutionists have as full power to buy and ship as the Spaniards. It is upon the fitting out of a military or naval expedition, warlike in its character, that the neutrality laws operate. It is an entire mistake to suppose that the United States officers have ever been instructed to stop the shipment of merchandise though it be in the form of articles contraband of war.

The owners and masters of vessels must simply take their own risk in these cases. But if an expedition, whether of armed men or armed vessels intended for naval warfare, is started in our ports, then the question of our duty as neutrals or as a friendly power arises, and even if we had acknowledged the independence of Cuba our duty and our rule could be no whit different until we had directly and publicly espoused one side of the question by making war upon the other. You must remember that we constantly bought arms of England during the rebellion, and no one questioned the legal right of Englishmen to sell to us or the Confederacy. The blockade runners took their own risk of capture, but the Alabama was fitted out to make war upon us as a ship of war. The Cuban republicans must learn to make this distinction before complaining of our conduct. In this respect, as I have said above, the recognition of their independence would not alter the law.

Yours, truly,

J. D. COX,
Secretary of the Interior.

It was unanimously decided by his whole Cabinet that no nation had a right to arrest that vessel on the high seas. Neither Spain nor any other country on the face of the earth could go behind the papers that accredited the vessel; that they were conclusive; it was American soil; and American authority granted the right of security to everyone on its decks. And yet, Mr. President, I say with shame that we permitted that butchery to go almost unchallenged. There was a long list of correspondence, amounting to some hundred or two papers, back and forth, and a little milk-and-water agreement between Mr. Fish and Mr. Barnaby, the minister of Spain, that the guilty party should be brought to justice and tried. They had a tribunal arranged in Spain to try Burriel, and after a long correspondence, running through three or four years, the Government of the United States was notified that the tribunal was organized, that it took jurisdiction, and that the Government of Spain could do no more. The court could do with him as they please. The result was Burriel died a natural death and was never brought to trial at all. And for 53 people butchered on the decks of that vessel, rightfully claiming the protection of the United States, the great body of them American citizens, after a long controversy Spain paid $77,000, about $1,500 apiece.

Now, look upon this picture and upon this, Hyperion to a satyr. At Salonica, in 1876, while this correspondence was going on, a Greek girl was taken from some Mussulmans. The German consul and the French consul rushed into the street where there was a mob attempting to carry her away, to plead for the girl and protect her, if possible. They were cut down and stabbed to death in the streets. The Turkish Government, without waiting for any invitation from Germany or France, telegraphed over the wires that they would punish those people, that it was unauthorized, and offered to do everything.

Did France enter into a long correspondence running through five or six years? Did Germany do it? They did not even deign to answer the telegram, but each one ordered its fleets to Salonica, landed its marines on the shore, and compelled the Government of Turkey to bring the guilty wretches before them, and under the muzzles of their guns they shot to death six of these perpetrators, and then said: "Pay $100,000 to the family of each one of these persons and I leave you," and it was done.

Mr. President, that brings me to the last question to consider in this case. Why is it that in the latter years of our Government every time we attempt to maintain the honor, the dignity, and the respect of our people some tremendous power commences to manifest itself in secret and in quiet, and we hear all sorts of objections except the real one? In the revolution of 1868–1878 they said that Spain had just thrown off the monarchy and bloomed out into a republic, and we will do great damage to republican government—such as we have instituted in this country is felt all over the world—if we talk plainly to Spain. "Remember," they said before, "Castellar is very proud and sensitive. Do not wound his feelings."

Mr. President, the blood of our citizens butchered by Spain is crying from the earth to us, and I for one am for calling her to account, and if her pride is wounded by our demand for proper treatment from her, she may fret till her proud heart breaks.

We hear now the same old plea. Spain is even vindicated here. With the atrocities of three hundred years piled up against her, her cause is espoused and boldly defended. We are told that the insurgents are ungrateful to Spain. When generation after generation of Cubans have been sent to bloody graves by her hand it is ungrateful even to remonstrate.

Mr. STEWART. Will I interrupt the Senator from Texas if I inquire of him whether he thinks the $1,200,000,000 of bonded debt which Spain owes, included in which is a lien of $300,000,000 upon Cuban revenues, has anything to do with the reluctance of other nations to interfere in favor of humanity in this case?

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, there is something away down under the surface, I can see and feel it moving up to the surface, I do not know just exactly what it is. I think I know, but I can not say positively whether it is foreign securities or what it is, but I know one thing. I know that the great heart of the American people is now pleading for the right and the honor of America. I suppose somebody has some interest in importing sugar. Of course that is going to be disturbed and there will be some money lost in it. Foreign securities may fall. There may be $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 lost in the United States, occasioned by the Senate and House of Representatives asserting the rights, the dignity, and honor of the American people. But, Mr. President, I would rather spend a hundred million dollars and take the captives from the Isle of Pines that Spain has been sending there for fifty years and liberate them, because it is our duty to do it. We have assumed such a relation toward Cuba that the blood of the poor wretches who have rotted on the Isle of Pines and whose bones are scattered about over the whole land rises up against us. The spot of bloody guilt is on our hands and we may fain cry, "Out, damned spot!" All the waters of ocean can not wash this guilt away.

It is our duty, Senators, to protect those people or say to England, France, Russia, and any others, "If you want that island take it; we have nothing to say about it." But as long as we say to all the earth, "You shall not touch it; it belongs to Spain and we will keep it in the hands of Spain," then I say that an awful load of guilt is rolled upon our souls, and we, to whom the honor of our country and our people are intrusted, must stand as Americans, and we must say to Spain, "You shall give that island self-government, or we will." Poor old Oliver Goldsmith said a long time ago:

Honor fails where commerce long prevails.

The right to receive a cargo and make $100,000 on it, and the right to send out a cargo and make $100,000 on it; these are the things that are now poking their heads up all over this country and pleading against "jingoism." I received a letter this morning from New York. "Another fool," the writer says, "has turned jingo." He asks, "Could you not have left this jingoism to LODGE and CHANDLER and SHERMAN?" "What did you go into it for?" and he signs himself "A Disgusted Democrat." If I had one of the cathode rays and could put it into his pocket, I would find sugar stock. [Laughter.] No man who ever felt the honor of country touch his heart, no man who ever felt a feeling of humanity animate his bosom, in a time of this sort—when innocent women and girls and children are lifting their piteous hands and appealing to the Government that makes these things possible—could ever send such a message as that to a member of Congress.

Mr. President, I believe, as I said a while ago, that the hour is drawing nigh when guiltless blood shall penetrate the sky. I believe that the day is not very far off when the American people will see this as they saw that other slavery. I believe the day is approaching rapidly when the American conscience will stand up full armed and equipped and fill the Senate and the House and the Executive Mansion with men who will say to Spain, "This thing must stop. We will take that island from you. We will give to the people of Cuba the power to organize a government coming from the consent of the governed, the same sort of government that we have. We demand that they shall have the inalienable right."

Our fathers said that everybody had the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and they said they had a right to institute government such as they might think proper that would secure those rights. Yet we stand in the way and prevent those poor people from instituting any government of their own. They plead and in agony groan and lift their piteous appeal to us, and their cries die on the air while we are the most powerful military people in the world, and the most advanced in civilization. We are right at their door. We have this little ewe lamb in our bosom that God has put here and made us the guardians for its protection. We have assumed that duty, and we still see her day by day and year by year tortured upon the rack.

Ah, sir, the day is coming when Cuba will arise and when there will be a voice that will speak to her like the voice of the apostle who saw the poor man lying at the beautiful gate to ask for alms and an invalid from his birth, begging alms of those who passed by him. The apostle told him he had no money; he could give no alms, but he gave that which was better. He said, "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk."

Here is another poor beggar lying at the beautiful gate, lying at the gate of the fortress that guards the rights and liberties and safety of the American people; she has been lying there for a century lifting up her shrunken hands and hollow cheeks and crying with salty tears to us, "Help us, O help us to get out of this dungeon." The American people will say after a while, in the name of the mighty Republic, "Arise to your feet and walk." She will extend to the poor mendicant her powerful right arm and lift her to her feet and enable her to stand.

Mr. President, a great many of our fathers have wanted and longed for the annexation of Cuba, a great many others have not, but they have all agreed that Cuba should never go to a power that was strong enough to imperil our rights and liberties. They have all agreed that she shall be under our protection. I am not asking for the annexation of Cuba and I am not longing for her admission as a State into our Union. I would say to Spain: "You can give her local self-government, you can keep your paramount sovereignty over her, but you must protect her people and give them the power to control their domestic affairs. If you do not do it, then I will take possession of the island and with the armed forces of the United States I will see that they have the opportunity to organize a government and arm themselves for its security, and I will hold it until they are able to stand alone." If Cuba says: "I can not stand alone; I want to go with you; all these powers are ready to spring upon me; Spain will invade me, perhaps a combination of European powers will combine and assail me; I do not want to stay alone, I want your help—if she says—

> Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me.

Then, sir, I would say to her in the language of that sweet Irish poet:

> Come, rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer,
> Though the herd have fled from thee, thy home is still here;
> Here still is the smile that no cloud can o'ercast,
> And the heart and the hand all thy own to the last.
>
> Thou hast called me thy angel in moments of bliss,
> And thy angel I'll be 'mid the horrors of this—
> Through the furnace, unshrinking, thy steps to pursue,
> And shield thee, and save thee, or—perish there too.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to add a very few words to what the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has said. I want to say that I do not consider any time is wasted by the Senate of the United States in coming to a full knowledge of the situation that we are now dealing with. There is something more in this case than even the power to arouse the majestic and splendid and brilliant oratory to which we have just listened. There is a great deal of seriousness in it; there is a great deal of truth in it; of fact in it, and it seems that the Senate of the United States requires at the hands of certain gentlemen who have expressed opinions on this question, as they also have expressed opinions, that we shall continually exert ourselves to lay the evidence before the country upon which all of our proposed action is based, it makes no difference in what particular direction it may be exercised.

I desire, for a very few moments, to put into the RECORD some facts for the consideration of this body and also of the other House of Congress. I must quote from an American newspaper. It seems that in certain quarters that only source of information of which we are possessed is being continually questioned as to its truthfulness. I regret very much to find that that accusation rests upon the whole American press, as far as I have observed, for there is no dissent among the newspapers as to the facts that come from Cuba. I have yet to see a single statement in contradiction of the reports which have been made in the various newspapers of this country by the very intrepid men who have gone out there and exposed their lives and their liberties for the purpose of gaining information that we can not otherwise gain. I have a quotation here from an English paper as well as from an American paper as to the situation in London:

LONDON, March 24.

The Standard has a dispatch from Madrid, which says:

"The Epoca has two articles which are supposed to reflect the opinion of the cabinet and which have been much noticed. The first challenges the United States to doff its mask and display its true colors. If they want war, the Epoca says, Spain is ready to face it with becoming dignity. Otherwise, it advises the American politicians to desist from their vexatious debates and cover the hostility.

"The second article reviews Spain's chances of a European alliance.

"The other papers have similar patriotic articles. It is evident that the Government will refuse to allow an American commission to go to Cuba, because such a concession on the eve of the elections would damage Spanish prestige."

This is an extract from the London Standard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). Will the Senator from Alabama yield? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not object——

Mr. CULLOM. I want to say that I shall insist, as soon as the Senator from Alabama concludes his brief remarks, as I understand he desires to speak briefly, that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill shall be taken up for consideration. I hope there will be no opposition to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business which has just been laid before the Senate may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE. I merely want to say that I do not object for the purpose of taking the Senator from Alabama off his feet; but I call attention to the fact that yesterday, at the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], in charge of this subject-matter, it was withdrawn from the consideration of the Senate and recommitted practically to the committee of conference, with the general understanding, I suppose, that debate would be suspended until the conference committee should again report. I did not object to the Senator from Texas coming in upon his joint resolution, and I do not now, as I have said, seek to take the Senator from Alabama from the floor; but I do insist that at the end of his remarks upon the joint resolution it shall take its parliamentary course and go to the Calendar. I make the point now, so that if I am not here at the end of the Senator's remarks the joint resolution shall take that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has brought forth a new phase of this subject, one that has not hitherto been in charge of the Senate or before the Senate. He proposes that we shall go to the Government of Spain and demand of her that she shall give autonomy to Cuba, a government corresponding I suppose in some of its characteristics perhaps very closely, in the contemplation of the Senator from Texas, with that of Canada on the north; and in the event that Spain refuses to grant such autonomy to Cuba, that the American Government will use whatever force may be necessary to expel Spain from that island and take possession of it, so that the people there may have a fair opportunity to determine for themselves what form of government they will have.

That subject has not been before the Senate of the United States in that form or in any form, up to the present moment of time. Up to the time when the Senator from Ohio asked in the Senate a disagreement to the amendment of the House, after an agreement had been suggested by the committee of conference on the resolutions, we had expressed nothing but opinion. We had confined ourselves entirely to that domain. We had proposed no measure which would be binding upon the people of the United States in any sense whatever. It was the response of Congress to the opinion of the people as expressed in the petitions sent to us that we chose to utter.

Now, for that cause, as we expected would be the case, only because the Senate and the House have concurred in the opinion that a state of public war does exist in the Island of Cuba and that those people are entitled to belligerent rights—for that and for nothing more came from the Spanish authorities in Madrid the declaration which I have just read to the Senate, showing that they regard this as an act of hostility on the part of the Government of the United States. We have disclaimed in every form that it was possible to make a disclaimer that we had any hostile intentions toward Spain, that we were acting outside of the line of our duty, even if we had progressed to the extent that I claim we shall progress, to a resolution that is now lying upon the table, of a pure recognition of belligerency and the existence of war in Cuba, and the rights of Cuba and Spain as belligerents, and our rights and our duties as neutrals in that war.

My object in taking the floor this morning is to call attention to a matter of history with which I was not familiar at the time that it was occurring. Unfortunately the people of the Southern States at that time were themselves occupying the attitude of belligerents in what was termed by the Government of the United States a treasonable insurrection against the flag and Constitution of the country, so that what transpired in the United States at that time with the Government of the United States was entirely unknown to us.

Spain came forward at an early moment, as I am informed, before a gun had been fired, or at least before any great battle had been fought, and she recognized not the independence, but the belligerency of the Confederate States. She did not undertake in that recognition of belligerency to demarcate the States or the parts of States that were regarded by the United States as being in insurrection, but she took the whole area, without reference to State boundaries, and wherever the Government of the United States had recognized the fact that insurrection existed Spain recognized the fact that lawful belligerency existed, thereby entirely dissipating the argument which has been made here, I believe by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], that the recognition of belligerency extended only to the area where war actually prevailed, and that we had to make a demarcation of boundary before we could recognize that the Cuban Republic was engaged in a state of belligerency.

Mr. President, what I rose for was to call the attention of Congress to the situation of the United States at the time that she was conducting war for the purpose of putting down the rebellion and after Spain had recognized the belligerency of the Confederate States. I confess when my mind was first brought to consider this question I was somewhat puzzled to understand why it was that Spain should have been so magnanimous toward the Confederacy and should have been so active in her disposition to recognize the belligerency of the Confederate States.

We had an institution in the South in common with one that existed in Cuba and Puerto Rico at that time, the institution of slavery. But, sir, Spain very soon after, if not even before, the time that she recognized the belligerency of the Confederate States had set about with a determined purpose, as it appeared, to do two things: One was to establish a republic and the other was to emancipate the slaves. So General Grant, when he came into power afterwards, recognized that the war that was being conducted there was really a war for the emancipation of slaves, and it was conducted by the Spanish Government with that pledge attending every act of hostility that was inflicted upon the people of Cuba.

The consultation of the authorities, the correspondence between our minister in Spain and the Government of the United States during the struggle of which I have been speaking, discloses the reasons why Spain recognized the Confederacy. She thought, first of all, that she would have an ally in the Confederacy to protect and preserve slavery, after she had consented, even in Spain, that it should be abolished, that it would be restored; for, mark you, in regard to political rights and rights of war and rights of conquest Spain acts and has always acted upon the theory that once she has been stripped of a province or of a power she has always a right to go to war to recover it.

What did she do in the case of Mexico? Thirteen years after the Republic of Mexico had been recognized, without any pretext of war at all arising in the course of her relations or transactions in Mexico, she sent her fleets and her armies there to try to recover that territory. Her declaration of war against Mexico was based entirely upon the fact that Mexico had once been her property, and having once been her property was always subject to reclamation.

But Spain went further than that, Mr. President. Very soon after our war began Spain went and took possession of San Domingo, occupied it, and held it until the war with the United States was closed or was about to close. Why did Spain invade San Domingo while our war was going on? Because she expected by establishing her power in San Domingo to check the power of the United States or the influence of the United States in Cuba, and through that instrumentality, getting on the flank of the United States and of Cuba, she expected, if the war resulted in favor of the rebellion, that everything would be straight on principle and on sentiment; if it resulted however in favor of the United States Government, that she would then have a military possession in San Domingo that would enable her to check any advance of the United States in that direction.

Spain was not alone among the European Governments in assailing the United States on that occasion. She had a number, if not of allies, at least of sympathizers, in Europe who took advantage of the struggle in the United States to come and plant themselves or attempt to plant themselves on different parts of the American Hemisphere. We find that Great Britain had already occupied, in the name of the Mosquito King, the mouth of the San Juan River, to command our communications with the Pacific. We find that Austria and France and Great Britain and Spain started out together for the purpose of hunting Mexico to death and reclaiming that territory while our war was going on. After a while Spain and Great Britain dropped off. They came under the pretext of collecting interest on bonds, when everyone knew that their determination was not merely to do that, but to acquire the territory of Mexico and put it under some sovereign crown, to be ruled by a prince of the blood brought from Europe. Maximilian having been elected, as he said, under a plebiscite in Mexico, came at last, under the auspices and protection of the Emperor of France, to occupy Mexico. But on all hands everywhere our great Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, had to wrestle with almost every important European power except Russia in trying to maintain the integrity of American soil for the government of her own people according to their own will in trying to maintain the integrity of republics on this hemisphere and to prevent them from being supplanted with monarchies.

Mr. President, I want to read a very few selections from some of the correspondence that took place at that time upon this question. The charge was made by Spain against the United States that we had negotiated a secret treaty for the purpose of acquiring the Bay of Samana, a very important piece of water, surrounded by a very important piece of land when considered either in respect to its commercial value or its strategetic value for naval war purposes. Mr. Seward, on the 23d of November, 1863, a time of very great anxiety with the Government of the United States, said, in a letter to Mr. Koerner, our minister at Madrid:

> The idle calumny that the United States have stirred up and are giving aid to the revolutionary movements now occurring in the Island of San Domingo would not be thought worthy of notice if it had not been presented to me by Mr. Tassara. I give you for your information a copy of the correspondence which has been held on that subject between him and this Department. I am further not unwilling to have an occasion to let it be known to Spain, as well as to other nations, how faithfully we practice the duties as well as assert the rights of a sovereign State. The United States neither contrive, nor aid, nor encourage, nor mix themselves up in civil or international wars of other nations. They submit their record on this matter to the examination of the world and challenge contradiction of its verity. You may express yourself to this effect, and even to this extent, if occasion should arise in your conversations with the Marquis of Miraflores.

That is dated November 23, 1863. There Mr. Seward discovered in the correspondence that was being conducted that the Government of the United States was being accused of improper interference for the purpose of acquiring some occupancy in the West India island. On the 14th of February, 1864, Mr. Koerner writes to Mr. Seward as follows:

> It is reported upon pretty good authority that a commission will be sent there to make a thorough investigation into the condition of affairs.

That is, to Santo Domingo.

> Letters from the island, freely published in the papers here, represent a thorough conquest and the restoration of lasting tranquillity there as impossible. It is easy enough for the Spanish troops to subdue the insurgent places near the coast, where such troops can be subsisted by the fleet. But the interior is said to be so thinly peopled, so little cultivated, so densely covered by primeval forests, so destitute of roads, that no armies can penetrate into the country, where bands of natives exist with ease, ready to issue forth whenever an opportunity offers to assail the Spanish posts.

That gives the state of the war between Spain and Santo Domingo while our war was progressing, February 14, 1864. What was Spain doing there making war upon Santo Domingo? That will appear a little later.

I have a number of extracts which I should like to read, but under the admonitions in regard to the waste of time here and considering other matters, I shall not do it; but I could not forbear the opportunity of laying these matters before the Senate and the country in order to show that the motive of Spain toward the United States, while our war was going on, in recognizing the belligerency of the Confederate States, was a motive connected with her determination to seize whatever of territory she could in the time of our distress and paralysis and hold it after our struggle had ended.

On January 31, 1865, Horatio J. Perry, who was then our minister at Madrid, wrote to Mr. Seward as follows:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Madrid, January 31, 1865.

SIR: The debates in the Spanish Senate, which have run over a period of about twenty days, have been unusually interesting.

On the question of the reply to the Queen's speech, senators of the opposition have taken occasion to review the whole policy of the Government.

Attacked on the questions of the abandonment of Santo Domingo and the plan for the relief of the treasury by the adherents of O'Donnell, with that leader at the head, and on the question of the encyclical letter of the Pope and general policy of ministers toward Rome and Italy by the new Catholic orators, I have rarely witnessed a debate in which there has been more vigor and persistence shown in the attack or a cooler and more solid ability displayed in the defense. The orators of the Government have had the best of the argument on every point, but the struggle has been severe.

The name of the United States has been used as a bugbear by the orators of the opposition, who claimed that the occupation of Santo Domingo by the Spaniards was the only way of averting the annexation of Dominica to the United States and the consequent ruin of Spanish interests in the West Indies. The Duke of La Torre, the same captain-general of Cuba who made the arrangement with the Dominican general, Santara, was the loudest in this argument.

The Marquis of Valdeterrazo, minister of Spain to London in 1860, made the declaration of which I inclose a translation.

The Marquis of the Habana (General Concha), who has been twice captain-general of Cuba, and is now out with O'Donnell, defended the policy of abandonment, and said that the United States had long ago refused the annexation of Dominica (referring to the Cazneau treaty), and that Spain had taken them up only after they had been refused by other powers.

The Duke of La Torre (General Servaro) spoke strongly in favor of a declaration by Spain that the slave trade is piracy, and wanted steps to be immediately taken for the abolition of slavery in Cuba.

The Marquis of Habana desired the extinction of slavery, but preferred measures like those which Brazil had taken to suppress the slave trade, and which had been successful in two years.

He said that if there were anything to be apprehended from the side of the United States, or from any quarter, as a military man he must say that he thought the policy of Spain ought to be to concentrate her power as much as possible; and the possession of Santo Domingo added no strength to Spain, but was a decided source of weakness. The resources of Cuba were uselessly employed in Santo Domingo, and they might be needed in that island itself.

The debate was closed last evening, and the reply to the Queen's speech being put to the vote, passed the Senate by a vote of 102 for and 58 against the policy of the Government.

This is not a direct vote upon the bill for the abandonment of Santo Domingo, this bill not being before the Senate but before the lower House, to come up afterwards to the Senate; but the question is thus already debated and settled indirectly so far as the Senate is concerned, the House having done little else except to adjourn over from day to day to give the members an opportunity to be present at the Senate debates, and allow ministers also to be all present in the upper House.

This great trial of parliamentary strength over, all the interest now centers in the lower House, and the Senate adjourns over to allow ministers to be all present in the other House, as well as the senators themselves.

But the question of Santo Domingo is already prejudged, and the bill for the abandonment is already virtually carried by the Government.

* * * * * * *

With sentiments of the highest respect, I remain, sir,
Your obedient servant,

HORATIO J. PERRY.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington.

Here is a translation, which Mr. Perry sends to his Government, of the declaration of the Marquis of Valdeterrazo:

[Translation.]

A mistake has been made in saying that the United States have made a treaty of annexation with Santo Domingo. This is not the fact.

When I was in London I was authorized by the Government of Her Majesty to occupy myself in this question, all the necessary facilities being conceded to me to engage not only the English Government but also the French to associate with the Spanish Government to carry out a demonstration to be made in the Bay of Samana.

I call attention to that, that the British Government, the French Government, and the Spanish Government, according to this statement, had made an agreement to carry out a demonstration to be made in the Bay of Samana.

Being authorized in this way, I conferred with the English Government on the serious damage which would be caused by the occupation of the Bay of Samana by the Anglo-American Government.

The English Government understood it in this light, but did not wish to bind itself unless the French Government associated itself also. I addressed myself to the latter, making a full explanation of the evils, the inconveniences, and the damage which the commerce of the three nations would receive if the United States should found an establishment or raise a fortification in that harbor. The French Government understood the gravity of the question, associated itself with the English and Spanish Governments, and the result was that the three made a demonstration toward the Bay of Samana, at the same time giving instructions to their representatives at Washington to manifest the displeasure which the three Governments would feel if the treaty of which we had advice, but whose tenor was not known, should be carried into effect.

The English Government some time after, having given the necessary orders for the uniting of the maritime forces of the three powers with the above-named object, obtained the first copy of this treaty, which it remitted to the Government of her Majesty.

In this treaty the annexation was not established. That which was alone established was the right to raise a fortification and to found a national establishment in the Bay of Samana by means of a compensation and other services to the Republic of Santo Domingo. For this reason the Duke de la Torre said very opportunely that the occupation of Samana is highly important, and that the Spanish Government should not abandon a post of so much value, not only for the Governments of England and France, but much more for the interests of Spain. In this I agree with the Duke de la Torre, and I say to the ministers that the abandonment of Santo Domingo is a danger, and I also say to the ministers that they ought to consider well to what an extent the security of our provinces beyond sea is compromised by the abandonment of Santo Domingo. The Government is still in time to avoid the evils and consequences which this measure may produce, and let it not be said that this is but an echo, for in order to defend Puerto Rico and the Island of Cuba more expense will have to be borne than is necessary to preserve Santo Domingo.

Those facts, I hope, will draw the attention of statesmen who are in this body to the situation of Spain at that time, to her purposes, and why it was she was occupying the Island of Santo Domingo while we were at war, after she had recognized the belligerency of the Confederate States. She and England and France combined to make an assault upon the United States for the purpose of displacing rights they supposed we had acquired by a secret treaty with the Government of Santo Domingo. Was her feeling toward us on that occasion friendly? Was there not a motive in her recognition of the belligerency of the Confederate States? Does she not stand before this people to-day and before the world as having been influenced in that apparently peaceful act by motives that had regard to the acquisition of power to the monarchy of Spain and in regard also to the infliction of wrong and injustice upon the people of the United States? There they had intended to violate the doctrine which the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] referred to and has spoken upon so eloquently, which has been established in the expressed opinions of every statesman in America of whom I have ever heard, that we would not permit any foreign power to come and acquire dominion in these American islands. They intended taking advantage of what they supposed was the weakness or the embarrassment of the United States during a time of war to do precisely what was done by Austria and France and Maximilian afterwards—they intended to come here and intrench themselves upon this territory, and Spain came without any cause of war against Santo Domingo, a pure invasion, and took that island into her custody at the time we were engaged in belligerent operations here, in civil warfare.

Therefore, Mr. President, it will not do for us to sit by and ignore the facts of history and quietly and serenely to regard Spain as having been always our friend under all circumstances. That story has been told here until I suppose the American people were ready to believe that Spain had always been the bosom friend of the United States, and yet the very moment she found the United States in war, and before the battle of Bull Run had been fought, she recognized the belligerency of the Confederate States, and afterwards, as soon as she could marshal her ships and her armies, went and took possession of the Island of Santo Domingo, and held it until the rebel flag in the South was hauled down.

There is one other fact which I wish to put into the RECORD, and that is the proclamation of General Weyler, a circular of General Weyler's addressed to the military officers. This is not to the people; this is to the military. He addressed another to the people, in which he prescribed specific things that they were to do; certain lines of conduct which they were to observe, on the penalty of being shot to death without trial if they undertook to violate them. He says to the military:

I have addressed my previous proclamations at the moment of my landing to the loyal inhabitants, to the volunteers and firemen, and to the army and navy.

I may give you a slight idea of the intentions I have and the measures I shall follow as governor general in chief, in accordance with the general desire of Spain and with the decided aim of Her Majesty's Government to furnish all the means required to control and crush this rebellion.

Knowing this, and knowing my character—

What an appeal that was—Weyler appealing to his character—

I may perhaps need to say no more to make you understand what is the conduct that I am to follow.

There he anchors himself to every vile precedent that he had established in the previous war, and pledged himself to his officers, through his character and through the history of his conduct that he would repeat the same enormities in this struggle.

Mr. ALLEN. He appealed to his known character as a butcher.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; he appealed to his character as a butcher, as the Senator well says. His proclamation continues:

But with the idea of avoiding all kinds of doubt, even keeping (as you are to keep) the circulars to be published, I deem it necessary to make some remarks.

It is not unknown by you that the state in which the rebellion has come and the raid made by the principal leaders recently, which could not be stopped even by the active pursuit of the columns, is due to the indifference, the fear, or the disheartenment of the inhabitants.

Is that public war? Are the people so disheartened or so afraid or so indifferent as that he has now to use the torture of war for the purpose of nerving them through a greater and higher fear to stand under his colors and fight his battles? He says further:

Since it can not be doubted that some, seeing the burning of their property without opposition, and that others who have been born in Spain should sympathize with the insurgents, it is necessary, at all hazards, to better this state of things and to brighten the spirit of the inhabitants, making them aware that I am determined to lend all my assistance to the local inhabitants.

PRAISING THE REBELS UNLAWFUL.

So I am determined to have the law fall with all its weight upon all those in any way helping the enemy, or praising them, or in any way detracting from the prestige of Spain or its army or of its volunteers. It is necessary for those by our side to show their intentions with deeds, and their behavior should leave no doubt and should prove that they are Spanish.

Since the defense of the country demands the sacrifice of her children, it is necessary that the towns should look to their defense, and that no precautions in the way of scouts should be lacking to give news concerning the enemy and whether it is in their neighborhood, and so that it may not happen that the enemy should be better informed than we.

The energy and vigor of the enemy will be strained to trace the course of our line, and in all cases you will arrest and place at my disposal to deliver to the courts those who in any way shall show their sympathy or support for the rebels.

The public spirit being encouraged, you must not forget to enlist the volunteers and guerrillas in your districts, not preventing at the same time the organization, as opportunity offers, of a guerrilla band of 25 citizens for each battalion of the army.

I propose that you shall make the dispositions you think most proper for the carrying out of the plan I wish, but this shall not authorize you to determine anything not foreseen in the instructions, unless the urgency of some circumstances should demand it.

"Urgency of circumstances," Mr. President, is a thing that General Weyler left to his officers, and amongst the particular orders which he issued, and which I have quoted in the RECORD at another place on a former occasion, he says that persons who are captured either with arms or without arms, whether they are citizens or whether they are soldiers, shall be sent to him at his headquarters wherever they may be; but if there is any insolence toward a Spanish officer this will not be expected—I do not quote his words; I have given the idea—that is to say, if they can provoke the poor victim into any sort of expression of heat or disappointment, any insolence toward the officer who may take him, "you can take him out and have him shot, and you will do all right."

I expect that, confining yourself to these instructions, you will lend me your worthy support toward the carrying out of my plan for the good of the Spanish cause.

WEYLER.

That is all I wish to say about this business. The American people can make their own comments, and they will not be slow to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the chair). The joint resolution which was introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will go to the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House further insisted upon its amendment to the concurrent resolution of the Senate relative to the insurrection in Cuba; agreed to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HITT, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4463) to grant two condemned cannons and cannon balls to the Thirteenth Separate Company National Guard of State of New York.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 227) requiring bills of sale, conditional sales, mortgages, or deeds of trust of chattels in the District of Columbia to be recorded;

A bill (H. R. 1861) for the relief of James Linkey from the operation of the act restricting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens;

A bill (H. R. 3549) authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Canal, in Aransas County, Tex.;

A bill (H. R. 4424) to correct the military record of George I. Spangler;

A bill (H. R. 5675) authorizing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo.;

A bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893; and

A bill (H. R. 6833) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 1616) to pension Michael E. Bucker, of Edgerton, Ind.;

A bill (H. R. 3886) to reimburse W. W. Rockhill for moneys erroneously paid the United States;

A bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5979) for the right of the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal;

A bill (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.; and

A bill (H. R. 6936) for the reconstruction of the Rock Island Bridge.

SAFETY OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES AND TRAVELERS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There has just come over from the other House a bill to amend the act to promote the safety of employees and travelers. A similar bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, the effect of which is merely to provide that trains used exclusively for logging may be relieved from the provisions of the act. The cars used in logging trains, of which there are about 400 in the United States, are only 24 inches high, and it is physically impossible to equip them with grab irons and the other appurtenances required by law. The act goes into force very soon, and I hope the bill may now be passed. It has passed the House of Representatives and a similar bill has passed our committee unanimously.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the bill ought to be passed at some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the bill indicated.

The bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the bill (S. 2027) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893, be indefinitely postponed. The bill was reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and is to the same effect as the bill just passed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 227) requiring bills of sale, conditional sales, mortgages, or deeds of trust of chattels in the District of Columbia to be recorded; and

A bill (H. R. 6833) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 3549) authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Canal, in Aransas County, Tex.; and

A bill (H. R. 5675) authorizing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo.

The bill (H. R. 4424) to correct the military record of George I. Spangler was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. FRYE. I think that the Senator ought to ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order to proceed with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that order has already been made.

Mr. FRYE. The unfinished business was laid aside temporarily in order that a speech might be made.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it was understood that that applied to the entire afternoon.

Mr. FRYE. All right, if that is the understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. When the Senate ceased considering the appropriation bill last evening we were on page 31, relating to the office of Comptroller of the Treasury, and in the consideration of that paragraph the appropriation for the salary of the Assistant Comptroller was raised to $5,000 by a vote of the Senate. That necessitates a change of the total in line 19. The Committee on Appropriations reported to increase the total on account of the amendment reported by it from $39,400 to $39,900. I now move that the total be changed to "$40,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning with line 20 on page 31, with the clause making appropriations for "Office of Auditor for Treasury Department." The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 36, line 5, before the word "pressmen," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 7, before the word "separators," to strike out "eight" and insert "eleven"; in line 8, before the word "feeders," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight," and in line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty-one" and insert "eighty-six thousand six hundred and one"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Treasurer: For Treasurer of the United States, $6,000; assistant treasurer, $1,600; cashier, $3,600; assistant cashier, $3,200; chief clerk, $2,500; five chiefs of division, at $2,500 each; vault clerk, $2,500; principal bookkeeper, $2,500; assistant bookkeeper, $2,100; two tellers, at $2,500 each; two assistant tellers, at $2,250 each; clerk for the Treasurer, $1,800; twenty-five clerks of class 4; seventeen clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; coin clerk, $1,400; twenty clerks of class 1; nine clerks, at $1,000 each; forty-seven clerks, at $900 each; twenty-five expert counters, at $720 each; nine clerks, at $700 each; mail messenger, $840; six messengers; six assistant messengers; twenty-three laborers; seven charwomen; four pressmen, at $1,200 each; one compositor and pressman, at $3.20 per day; eleven separators, at $660 each; eight feeders, at $660 each; in all, $286,601.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, after line 22, to insert:

For purchase of one press and one separating machine for use in sealing and separating securities, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 22, after the word "three," to insert "stenographer and typewriter, $1,500"; in line 23, before the word "clerks," to strike out "five" and insert "four"; and on page 41, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "six"; so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Statistics: For officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,250; statistical clerk, $2,000; four clerks of class 4, three clerks of class 3; stenographer and typewriter, $1,500; four clerks of class 2; nine clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; two copyists; one messenger; one assistant messenger; one laborer; and one female laborer, $480; in all, $47,650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 2, to insert:

For payment of the services of experts, and for other necessary expenditures connected with the collection of facts relative to the internal and foreign commerce of the United States, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 16, after the word "copyists," to strike out "one messenger, $600," and insert "two messengers, at $600 each"; and in line 20, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twenty-five thousand nine" and insert "twenty-six thousand five"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of Supervising Surgeon-General Marine-Hospital Service: For Supervising Surgeon-General, $4,000; one clerk, $1,800; five clerks, at $1,600 each; two clerks, at $1,200 each; clerk and translator, $1,200; hospital steward (employed as chemist), $1,200; six copyists; two messengers, at $600 each; two laborers, at $480 each, and one laborer, $360; in all $26,520, the same to be paid from the permanent appropriations for the Marine-Hospital Service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, line 15, before the word "and," to strike out "wagon" and insert wagons"; so as to read:

For purchase of horses and wagons for office and mail service, to be used only for official purposes, care and subsistence of horses, including shoeing, and of wagons, harness, and repairs of the same, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the provision for office of assistant treasurer at Boston, on page 49, line 1, after the word "dollars," to insert "messenger, $1,000"; in line 3, before the word "watchmen," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-eight thousand nine hundred and ten" and insert "forty thousand seven hundred and sixty"; so as to read:

Messenger and chief watchman, $1,060; messenger, $1,000; stenographer and typewriter, $1,000; four watchmen and janitors, at $850 each; in all, $40,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 15, after the word "dollars," to insert "stenographer, $720," and in line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-three thousand five hundred" and insert "thirty-four thousand two hundred and twenty"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $1,800; bookkeeper, assorting teller, and receiving teller, at $1,500 each; clerk, $1,600; two coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each; ten clerks, at $1,200 each; messenger, $840; stenographer, $720; janitor, $600; and three watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $34,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the provision for office of assistant treasurer at New York, on page 51, line 15, after the word "dollars," to insert "stenographer, $1,200"; in line 18, after the word "each," to insert "money counter, $900; money counter, $800"; and on page 52, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "ninety-two thousand eight" and insert "ninety-five thousand seven"; so as to read:

Stenographer and typewriter, $1,400; stenographer, $1,200; three clerks, at $1,300 each; eleven clerks, at $1,200 each; six clerks, at $1,000 each; money counter, $900; money counter, $800; two messengers, at $1,200 each; three messengers, at $900 each; two messengers, at $800 each; two hall men, at $1,000 each; two porters, at $900 each; superintendent of building, $1,800; chief detective, $1,500; assistant detective, $1,200; engineer, $1,050; assistant engineer, $820; six watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $195,790.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 20, to increase the appropriation for incidental and contingent expenses of the assay office at Boise, Idaho, from $2,000 to $3,000.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is not necessary, of course, to say anything in regard to the amendment, but for the benefit of the conferees I wish to state that the gold received at the assay office in Boise City, Idaho, increased about 33⅓ per cent last year over the previous year, and the indications are that during the next year it will be much further increased. The money for contingent expenses for the assay office is not adequate to take care of this largely increased work, owing to the great gold production in the State. This is one of the largest assay offices in the country, and we have not asked for a great deal.

I state these facts in order that they may be before the conferees. I am very glad to say that the committee of the Senate were willing to put in the additional increase asked for.

Mr. CULLOM. From the representations of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] before the committee we were unanimous in believing that the amendment should be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the provision for Territory of New Mexico, page 61, line 14, after the words "United States," to insert "except a translator and an interpreter"; so as to read:

That no other officer of either house of said legislative assembly shall be elected or appointed, or paid out of any moneys appropriated by the Congress of the United States or by the legislative assembly of said Territory, than such as may be provided for by the laws of the United States, except a translator and an interpreter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 14, to insert:

For repairs of the Adobe Palace at Santa Fe, N. Mex., $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the provision for Oklahoma Territory, on page 62, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That the legislative assembly shall not consider any proposition or pass any bill to remove the seat of government of said Territory from its present location.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 71, line 3.

Mr. CULLOM. Under the head of "Navy Department, Office of the Secretary," after the word "dollars," in line 15, page 70, I move to insert "appointment clerk, $2,250."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. The total should be corrected. I move, on page 71, lines 2 and 3, to strike out the words "forty-eight thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars" and insert "fifty-one thousand and ten dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 71, line 19.

Mr. COCKRELL. In accordance with the action taken yesterday, the words in line 12, "to be selected by reason of special aptitude," should be stricken out.

Mr. CULLOM. I think both lines 12 and 13 should go out, so as to read:

For two clerks of class 4.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would leave it in better shape.

Mr. CULLOM. I move to strike out, after the word "for," in line 11, page 71, the words "the following employees, to be selected by reason of special aptitude for the work by the Secretary of the Navy, namely"; so as to read:

Office of Naval Records of the Rebellion: For two clerks of class 4, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to page 76, line 18.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 76, under the heading of "Bureau of Steam Engineering," I move to strike out all of line 15, and in line 16 to strike out the word "assistant," where it first appears, and in lines 17 and 18 to strike out the words "eleven thousand and ninety" and insert "eight thousand eight hundred and forty"; so as to read:

Bureau of Steam Engineering: For chief clerk, $1,800; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one assistant messenger; two laborers; draftsman, $1,400; assistant draftsman, $1,000; in all, $8,840.

Those positions are provided for in previous pages of the bill, so that they are not needed here.

Mr. KYLE. Does the Senator move to strike out the word "assistant," in line 16, before the word "draftsman"?

Mr. CULLOM. The word "assistant" where it first occurs.

Mr. KYLE. Is it not necessary to substitute the word "one"; so as to read "one draftsman"?

Mr. CULLOM. The word "draftsman" covers the case. It will read:

Draftsman, $1,400; assistant draftsman, $1,000.

Mr. KYLE. The word "one" would be better.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think it is necessary there.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 79, line 7, before the the word "clerks," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten"; so as to read "ten clerks of class 3," and on page 80, line 1, to increase the total appropriations for the Office of the Secretary, under the head of "Department of the Interior," from $220,070 to $221,670.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. After the word "dollars," in line 2, on page 80, I move to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ laborers in the work of distributing the reports of the Eleventh Census, $3,960, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Interior on the subject be incorporated in the RECORD without being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 18, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to an embarrassment to which the Department of the Interior is subjected in the distribution of the reports of the Eleventh Census, which embarrassment has arisen as follows:

Section 64 of the act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, reads as follows: "Upon the appointment of the superintendent of documents as hereinbefore provided, the office of the superintendent of documents in the Department of the Interior shall be, and is hereby, abolished, and all laws now in force providing for the delivery to the Department of the Interior of public documents for distribution, other than such as are for the use of that Department, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That the distribution of the reports of the Eleventh Census shall be continued and completed by the superintendent of documents, under existing laws and regulations."

You will discover that by the provisions of this section the office of superintendent of documents in the Interior Department was abolished upon the appointment of superintendent of documents by the Public Printer. The proviso of said section, however, seems to contemplate that the distribution of the reports of the Eleventh Census shall be continued and completed by the former incumbent of the office in the Interior Department after said office had been abolished.

Owing to the vague, ambiguous provisions of said section I have been in doubt as to whether the duty of the distribution of the reports of the Eleventh Census devolved upon the newly appointed superintendent of documents or the former incumbent of that office.

Up to this time, however, the distribution of said reports has been continued by the clerk in charge of documents in the Interior Department.

I have called your attention to the ambiguity in section 64 above referred to, thinking that you might see proper to amend the same so as to make its provisions more explicit or that you may make some legislative interpretation of the same.

I next call your attention to the fact that Congress failed to make provision for the employment of a sufficient number of packers to do the work of distribution, as has been the case in the distribution of former Census reports, as you will see, for instance, by reference to 22 Statutes at Large, page 555, and 23 Statutes at Large, pages 185 and 416.

Up to the present time the work of distribution has been done by a detailed force from the Census roll, but we have now reached that point where this detailed force is no longer available.

Under date of 17th instant the Commissioner of Labor in charge, in a letter directed to the Secretary of the Interior, calls attention to the fact that it was not contemplated by the act providing for the printing and binding and distribution of the final reports of the Eleventh Census that the distribution should be made by the Census Office. In this letter the Commissioner of Labor says:

"I desire now to call your attention to the fact that it is impossible for the Census division to carry these details any longer on the Census roll. There are now 10 such details. I believe it possible to complete all the clerical work legitimately belonging to the Census division under the appropriations now at its disposal, but if the Census division must carry the expense of distributing the volumes, a duty which by law does not belong to it, I hardly think such a result possible."

We are now left, therefore, without any laboring force with which to do this work. For this purpose it is necessary that the Department be allowed to employ six laborers to carry on the work.

I respectfully suggest an amendment to the legislative, judicial, and executive bill now pending before your committee allowing the Department to employ such persons, and that the funds necessary to do so be made immediately available.

If it should be the opinion of your committee, after the investigation of the provisions of said section 64, that the work of distribution should be done by the present superintendent of documents, I should be glad to be at once advised of such opinion.

Respectfully, HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Senator W. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Senate Appropriation Committee.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 85, after line 22, to insert:

For the purchase of statutes and other necessary law books for the Pension Office, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 11, to insert:

Classification division, Patent Office: For additional force for the Patent Office, namely: For chief of classification division, $2,000; two first assistant examiners, at $1,800 each; two second assistant examiners, at $1,600 each; two third assistant examiners, at $1,400 each; twenty-four fourth assistant examiners, at $1,200 each; two clerks, at $1,000 each; one copyist, at $900; and one assistant messenger, at $720; in all, $44,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the close of the paragraph on page 88, making appropriation "for producing copies of drawings of the weekly issues of patents," etc.

Mr. PLATT. There is a proposed amendment to come in there, but I suppose we may as well wait until the bill is read through before it is offered.

Mr. CULLOM. To what clause does the Senator refer?

Mr. PLATT. To the clause beginning in line 4 and ending in line 16, on page 88. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] proposes to offer an amendment to come in at the end of that clause, but I suppose it should properly be offered after the bill has been read through.

Mr. KYLE. I intend to offer the amendment after the reading of the bill has been completed.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will then have an opportunity to do so.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 3 of the clause making appropriations for compensation of Commissioner of Education and the clerks and employees in his office, on page 89.

Mr. BATE. On page 89, line 2, after the word "statistician," I give notice that I shall move to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000," increasing the salary of that officer to that amount. I do not ask to have the amendment considered just now, however, but shall offer it after the reading of the bill has been concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be considered hereafter when the committee amendments are concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Tennessee and all other Senators will have an opportunity of offering amendments after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. BATE. Very well.

Mr. CULLOM. I therefore hope the Senator will not offer his amendment for the present.

Mr. BATE. I shall take that course.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 89, line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand six hundred" and insert "two thousand"; and in line 16, after the word "thousand," to insert "four hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

Bureau of Education: For Commissioner of Education, $3,000; chief clerk, $1,800; statistician, $1,800; collector and compiler of statistics, $2,400; specialist in foreign educational systems, $1,800; specialist in education as a preventive of pauperism and crime, $2,000; two clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; translator, $1,600; four clerks of class 2; seven clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; seven copyists; skilled laborer, $840; two copyists, at $800 each; copyist, $720; one assistant messenger; two laborers; two laborers, at $480 each; laborer, at $400; and one laborer, at $360; in all, $50,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 90, after line 19, to insert:

The Commissioner of Education is hereby authorized to prepare and publish a bulletin of the Bureau of Education as to the condition of higher education, technical and industrial education, facts as to compulsory attendance in the schools, and such other educational topics in the several States of the Union and in foreign countries as may be deemed of value to the educational interests of the States, and there shall be printed one edition of not exceeding 25,000 copies of each issue of said bulletin for distribution by the Bureau of Education.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to offer a slight amendment to make it certain from what fund the expense provided for in that clause will come. I move the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on line 4, page 91.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of line 4, page 91, the following:

The expense of printing and binding such bulletins to be charged to the allotment for printing and binding for the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CULLOM. The Public Printer thought it would probably be safer to make that item a little more specific.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not consent to let the matter beginning at section 6, on page 116, go over until to-morrow? I have to leave the Senate for a time, and I have something I wish to say when that matter comes up. The section to which I refer is that in regard to United States district attorneys and marshals.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall make no objection to that request, as we shall probably not reach that point this evening. I agree that the provision to which the Senator refers shall go over until tomorrow.

Mr. MILLS. I have some letters I wish to read before that section is acted upon.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 92, line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seven watchmen employed on the Capitol Grounds, at $840 each; in all, twenty thousand six hundred and forty-four" and insert "fourteen thousand seven hundred and sixty-four"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Architect of the Capitol: For Architect, $4,500; one clerk of class 4; draftsman, $1,800; compensation to disbursing clerk, $1,000; one assistant messenger; person in charge of the heating of the Congressional Library and Supreme Court, $864; laborer in charge of water-closets in central portion of the Capitol, $660; three laborers for cleaning Rotunda, corridors, and Dome, at $660 each; two laborers in charge of public closets of the House of Representatives and in the terrace, at $720 each; in all, $14,764.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 93, line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert "additional rooms for the engraving and printing division of the Geological Survey, $1,200"; and in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-nine thousand" and insert "forty thousand two hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

For rent of buildings for the Department of the Interior, namely: For the Bureau of Education, $4,000; Geological Survey, $10,000; additional rooms for the engraving and printing division of the Geological Survey, $1,200; Indian Office, $6,000; storage of documents, $2,000; Civil Service Commission, $4,000; Patent Office model exhibit, $13,000; in all, $40,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eight thousand five hundred" and insert "ten thousand"; and in line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ten thousand five hundred" and insert "twelve thousand"; so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of the State of Colorado, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $10,000; in all, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 94, line 15, before the word "dollars," to insert "six hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

For rent of office for the surveyor-general, fuel, books, pay of messenger, stationery, and other incidental expenses, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of the clause making appropriations for the salary of the surveyor-general of Oregon and his clerical force, beginning in line 12, on page 96.

Mr. McBRIDE. I wish now, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, to offer an amendment which I was instructed to submit by that committee.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment to which the Senator refers is an original amendment to the provision as it comes from the other body to the Senate, and will only be in order after we get through with the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McBRIDE. Very well; I shall let the amendment go over for the present.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will have an opportunity to offer the amendment after the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations are disposed of.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 97, line 19, after the word "Department," to strike out "who shall also be superintendent of the Post-Office Department buildings"; so as to make the clause read:

Office Postmaster-General: For compensation of the Postmaster-General, $8,000; chief clerk Post-Office Department, $2,500; stenographer, $1,800; stenographer, $1,600; appointment clerk, $1,800; one clerk of class 4; two clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk, $1,000; one curator of museum, $1,000; one messenger; one assistant messenger; page, $360; in all, $26,020.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 98, line 23, before the word "laborers," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten"; and on page 99, line 18, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred and sixty" and insert "eight hundred and twenty"; so as to make the clause read:

Office First Assistant Postmaster-General: For First Assistant Postmaster-General, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of salary and allowance division, $2,500; superintendent of post-office supplies, $2,000; superintendent of free delivery, $3,000; assistant superintendent of free delivery, $2,000; three clerks of class 4; nine clerks of class 3; eight clerks of class 2; nine clerks of class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; three clerks, at $900 each; six assistant messengers; ten laborers; two pages, at $360 each; superintendent of the money-order system, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; six clerks of class 4; eight clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; six clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one assistant messenger; engineer, $1,000; assistant engineer for additional building for Auditor for Post-Office Department, $1,000; one fireman; four watchmen; conductor of elevator, $720; four charwomen; female laborer, $480; and ten laborers; superintendent of Dead-Letter Office, $2,500; one clerk of class 4, who shall be chief clerk; one clerk of class 4; three clerks of class 3; ten clerks of class 2; twenty-four clerks of class 1; twenty-eight clerks, at $1,000 each; thirty-three clerks, at $900 each; one assistant messenger; six laborers; four female laborers, at $480 each; in all $263,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 101, line 25, after the word "clerk" where it occurs the second time, to insert the words "and superintendent of buildings"; so as to read:

Office of disbursing clerk: Disbursing clerk and superintendent of buildings, $2,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 102, line 21, after the word "the" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "Sixth Auditor's Office" and insert "Auditor for the Post-Office Department"; so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Post-Office Department, including the additional building occupied by the money-order division of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department and the additional building used for storage of post-office supplies, namely, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 103, line 19, before the word "dollars," to insert "six hundred"; so as to make the clause read:

For purchase, exchange, and keeping of horses and repair of wagons and harness, to be used only for official purposes, $1,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 104, line 12, after the word "dollars," to strike out "And the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, cause the contract for furnishing the Official Postal Guide to be let for a term of four years"; so as to make the clause read:

For the publication of copies of the Official Postal Guide, including not exceeding 1,500 copies for the use of the Executive Departments, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 105, line 10, before the word "assistant," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; in line 17, before the word "clerks," to strike out "six" and insert "seven"; in line 21, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred"; in the same line, before the word "clerks," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight"; in line 22, before the word "clerks," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten"; in the same line, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eleven" and insert "fifteen"; in line 24, before the word "copyists," to strike out "nine" and insert "six"; and on page 106, line 5, before the word "hundred," to strike out "fifty-six thousand five" and insert "sixty-eight thousand six"; so as to make the clause read:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Office of the Attorney-General: For compensation of the Attorney-General, $8,000; Solicitor-General, $7,000; four Assistant Attorneys-General, at $5,000 each; Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, $4,000; Solicitor of Internal Revenue, $4,500; Solicitor for the Department of State, $3,500; two assistant attorneys, at $3,000 each; five assistant attorneys, at $2,500 each; assistant attorney, $2,000; law clerk and examiner of titles, $2,700; chief clerk and ex officio superintendent of the building, $2,500; stenographic clerk, $1,800; three stenographic clerks, at $1,600 each; two law clerks, at $2,000 each; seven clerks of class 4; attorney in charge of pardons, $2,400; additional for disbursing and appointment clerk, $500; chief of division of accounts, $2,200; eight clerks of class 3; ten clerks of class 2; fifteen clerks of class 1; telegraph operator and stenographer, $1,200; six copyists; one messenger; five assistant messengers; four laborers; three watchmen; engineer, $1,200; two conductors of the elevator, at $720 each; eight charwomen; superintendent of building, $250; and three firemen; in all, $168,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one thousand five hundred" and insert "two thousand"; so as to make the clause read:

For law books for library of the Department, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 24, before the word "clerks," to strike out "three" and insert "four," and on page 107, line 2, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twenty-six thousand eight" and insert "twenty-eight thousand six"; so as to make the clause read:

Office of the Solicitor of the Treasury: For Solicitor of the Treasury, $4,500; Assistant Solicitor, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,000; four clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $28,680.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 107, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert five"; so as to make the clause read:

For law books for office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 108, after line 23, to insert:

For expense of printing and distributing advance sheets of the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States to all the circuit and district judges of the United States, $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 109, after line 14, to insert:

For a messenger of the United States circuit court of appeals for the eighth judicial circuit, who shall also perform the duties of librarian and crier of said court, the sum of $2,000 as yearly compensation; said messenger shall also receive his necessary traveling and other expenses when said court shall hold a term at any other place than that of his residence, not to exceed, however, $5 per day, and said messenger shall be appointed by the judges of said circuit court of appeals to serve during the pleasure of the court.

Mr. CULLOM. In the clause making appropriations for "district courts," on page 110, line 8, before the word "district," I move to strike out "sixty-four" and insert "sixty-five," on account of the admission of Utah as a State of the Union; and in line 10, to change the total from "$320,000" to "$325,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 110, line 8, before the word "district," it is proposed to strike out "sixty-four" and insert "sixty-five"; and in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five"; so as to make the clause read:

District courts: For salaries of sixty-five district judges of the United States, at $5,000 each $325,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 110, line 19, after the word "and," to strike out "ninety-six" and insert "ninety-seven"; so as to make the clause read:

Retired judges: To pay the salaries of the United States judges retired under section 714 of the Revised Statutes, so much as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 111, after line 1, to insert:

For reporter, $1,500, to be paid monthly: Provided, That the reports issued by him shall not be sold for more than $5 per volume.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 111, line 8, before the word "hundred," to strike out "twenty-four thousand seven" and insert "twenty-six thousand two"; so as to make the clause read:

For necessary expenditures in the conduct of the clerk's office, $500; in all, $26,220, one-half of which shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 112, after line 2, to strike out:

That section 843 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 843. The allowances for personal compensation of district attorneys, clerks, and marshals shall be made for each fiscal year, and from the fees and emoluments of that fiscal year, and not otherwise."

That the compensation of district attorneys, clerks, and marshals for the half year ending June 30, 1896, shall be allowed and settled upon the basis of the returns for that half year.

That hereafter all United States marshals shall be allowed ninety days after the 30th of June and ninety days after the 31st of December in which to make their returns of fees and emoluments under the provisions of section 833 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which is hereby amended accordingly.

Mr. CULLOM. Those clauses are to be stricken out with the expectation that the provisions in reference to attorneys and marshals which are found in the bill will later be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 113, after line 20, to strike out:

SEC. 3. Section 166 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 166. Each head of a Department may, from time to time, alter the distribution among the various bureaus and offices of his Department of the clerks and other employees allowed by law, as he may find it necessary and proper to do, but all details hereunder shall be made by written order of the head of the Department, and in no case be for a period of time exceeding sixty days: Provided, That details so made may, on expiration, be renewed from time to time by written order of the head of the Department, in each particular case, for periods of not exceeding sixty days. All details heretofore made are hereby revoked, but may be renewed as provided herein."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 115, after line 21, to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed.

Mr. CULLOM. The remaining sections of the bill, commencing with line 24, page 115, and going down to the end of line 15, page 134, relate to attorneys and marshals of the courts, and I have consented that those provisions may go over until to-morrow morning. Section 21, which is on page 124, may be read and disposed of to the end of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The sections indicated will be passed over, and the reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed at line 16, page 134, and concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senate yesterday began on the first page of the bill, but there was considerable confusion in reference to the provisions as to clerks of committees, and I asked of the Senate to pass over that portion of the bill until later, which was done. I ask now that the Secretary begin to read where we stopped on those provisions.

The SECRETARY. After line 3, on page 5, the Committee on Appropriations report an amendment, to insert as follows:

For clerks to the Committees on Woman Suffrage, Mines and Mining, Immigration, Revision of the Laws of the United States, Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, Indian Depredations, and Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at $2,100 each, $14,700.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 8, in connection with the same subject-matter, "for 38 annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $1,200 each," I move in lieu of $1,200 to insert $1,440.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the one on page 5, which has been stated.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out the word "and," in line 7, and after the word "Canal," in the eighth line of the committee amendment, I move to insert "and on Revolutionary Claims."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that an amendment is already pending to the amendment.

Mr. KYLE. I believe my amendment to the amendment is pending, and I ask leave to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota is withdrawn. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the word "and," in line 7, and inserting after the word "Canal" the words "and on Revolutionary Claims."

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that it was an oversight that the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was not incorporated in the list. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GRAY. I move that there be added at the end of the amendment the words "the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes."

Mr. CARTER. I move as a substitute for the clause as read and for the various amendments what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out from line 4 to line 13, inclusive, as follows:

For clerks to the Committees on Woman Suffrage, Mines and Mining, Immigration, Revision of the Laws of the United States, Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, Indian Depredations, and Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at $2,100 each, $14,700.

For twenty-six clerks to committees, at $1,440 each; in all, $37,440.

And to insert:

For twenty-eight clerks to committees, at $1,800 each, the sum of $50,400.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment first in order is that offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the committee amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PEFFER. In the confusion I could not hear what the amendment was, and I am not ready to vote upon it.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the amendment for the time being.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to the amendment be again read.

Mr. GRAY. I have an amendment which precedes that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, strike out lines 3 to 13, inclusive, and insert:

For twenty-eight clerks to committees, at $1,800 each, the sum of $50,400.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it will be observed that my amendment to the amendment contemplates perfect equality in so far as concerns payment for the services of the seven clerks named in the first subdivision of the committee amendment and those referred to under the general designation of 21 clerks in the second subdivision, beginning with line 10. Under it the clerks of committees, designated as 21 in number, now receiving $1,440 a year will receive $1,800 in lieu of that sum, and those provided for in the first subdivision, designated as persons to receive $2,100 per annum, will be reduced from that amount to the sum of $1,800.

I understand the fact that all clerks of committees perform identically the same class of service; that the same talents are required for all the committees enumerated in this number of 28 clerks; that the service they perform is in no manner dissimilar. There does not seem to be any substantial reason why there should be a discrimination in the matter of payment for such services. I think the amendment to the amendment is equitable, just, fair, and that it in no sense creates a discrimination.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think, in order that Senators may be placed on a footing of equality and be treated with fairness and equity, the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] ought to be adopted. I know one instance that illustrates the injustice of the pending bill in this respect. I happen to be a member of two committees which have not a great deal to do. One is the Committee on Immigration and the other the Committee to Establish the University of the United States. By the bill as reported the clerk of one of those committees is given a salary of $2,100, while the clerk of the other, the Committee to Establish the University of the United States, is left at the old figure.

I know what the work of these two committees has been, and I know that the committee of which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. KYLE] is chairman, the Committee to Establish the University of the United States, has had more work and more hearings, and as a committee has done more work, than the committee which is favored by the bill.

It seems to me, in order that we may all have fair treatment and be placed on a footing of equality, that the amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted. I think the Senators in whose favor the discrimination is made in the paragraph in italics ought to be willing to yield this to the other Senators.

Mr. PEFFER. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the aggregate of the appropriation will be increased?

Mr. NELSON. Very little; only a few thousand dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] has offered an amendment.

Mr. GRAY. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 2, line 23, there is a provision for "librarian, $2,220." I move to strike out the words "two thousand two hundred and twenty dollars" and insert "two thousand five hundred dollars;" so that it will read "librarian, $2,500."

Mr. VEST. Librarian of what library?

Mr. GRAY. Of the Senate library.

The present librarian, Mr. Church, who has been there ever since I have been in the Senate and was there a good many years before, is known to all Senators, especially to the older ones, as a most efficient, trustworthy, and competent official. He holds a position which requires more than ordinary experience and education and some special aptitude, qualities that are not always to be found. He is a good lawyer, which a librarian of the Senate library ought to be. He is perfectly familiar with the history of legislation for the last quarter of a century, and we all know that we never apply to him without finding that he can give us the assistance which we are in special need of at the time of the inquiry.

I do not believe we have a right to demand or to expect to acquire the services of a man competent for that position for less than $2,500. It seems to me that we ought not to give him less than that sum now in his old age and disability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. One page 2, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "$2,220" and insert "$2,500"; so as to read:

Librarian, $2,500.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment. In the outset I wish to state that I think the amendment ought to be adopted. I happen to be one who has known for a great many years the gentleman who occupies the position of assistant librarian. When I first knew him he was a very eminent lawyer, the general solicitor of the Chicago and Alton Railroad, with his office at Chicago. He had subject to his orders many local attorneys, and was recognized as a very able lawyer and a most splendid gentleman in every way. It so happened that suddenly he was stricken in such a way as that he has had a very hard struggle to live and make a living for his family. He is a very able man, and while he is physically unable to move himself about very well, he is thoroughly competent for the discharge of the duties that he is charged with. I confess I would be very much gratified to see this amendment adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest as an amendment to the amendment "while held by the incumbent."

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to those words being added.

Mr. GRAY. Say "the present incumbent."

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; "while the office is held by the present incumbent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware accept the modification?

Mr. GRAY. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," on page 2, line 23, insert "while the office is held by the present incumbent."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 3, lines 8 and 9, the total ought to be fixed. I move to insert "$65,586.90" instead of the amount specified in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, on page 8, line 2, to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,500"; so as to read:

For thirty-eight annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $1,500 each, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the total for that item be changed so as to read "$57,000" instead of "$45,600."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. On page 34, line 3, after the words "thousand dollars," I move to insert, "for chief of division of judicial accounts, $2,200," and then to strike out "three" and insert "two"; so as to read "two chiefs of divisions." That makes the chief of the division in the Auditor's Department the same as the chief of the division in the Attorney-General's Office. He has jurisdiction of the same subjects-matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 8 I move to strike out "one" and insert "three"; so as to make the total read "$87,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. I now offer the amendment to which my attention was called by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], on page 88.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from South Dakota suspend one moment? On page 6, line 12, in the appropriations for the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, the word "two," near the end of the line, ought to be stricken out and "three" inserted; so as to make it read "three laborers" instead of "two." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me one moment I will correct the total there. I move, at the end of the paragraph, in lines 18 and 19, to insert as the total "$119,344" instead of "$118,504."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE. After the word "dollars," in line 16, on page 88, I move to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, cause the present contract for producing copies of the drawings of the weekly issues of patents for inventions, trade-mark certificates, drawings for the library editions of patents, for producing exhausted copies, and copies of pending applications, and of foreign patents or publications, and for producing the photolithographic work for the illustrated pages of the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, to be extended for the term of four years from the 1st day of July, 1896, or, in his discretion, he may make a new contract for the said work as now provided by law for the term of four years, beginning with the 1st day of July, 1896, the provisions of section 3679 of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I must make a point of order upon that amendment. It is new legislation, and in my judgment it would not be good legislation.

Mr. KYLE. I do not think it is new legislation, but it is merely carrying into effect the present law.

Mr. CULLOM. It is clearly new legislation.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to state with reference to the amendment that it has had the unanimous approval, I believe, of the Committee on Patents. It merely requires the Secretary of the Interior to continue the present contract for the publication of the Patent Office Gazette for a period of four years.

Mr. CULLOM. It is new legislation just the same.

Mr. KYLE. I presume the fact is familiar to all Senators here—we have discussed it in the Senate for the past four or five years at any rate—that one firm, the Norris Peters firm, in this city, had that contract and received since 1877, I believe, $145,000 a year until last year for the publication of this work. Last year it was thrown open again.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it is hardly worth while to argue the merits of the subject. I do not care to take up time in doing it myself. It seems to me the amendment is clearly new legislation under the rule.

Mr. KYLE. I have sat here this afternoon and have seen amendment after amendment placed upon the bill with the sanction of the Senator from Illinois, which amendments were more in the line of direct legislation than the amendment which I have offered. I do not think that a discrimination of this kind should be made against those who do not happen to belong to the Committee on Appropriations. This amendment has had the unanimous approval, I believe, of the Committee on Patents, who are capable of passing upon the subject, and I believe it is a very important one to the people of the country, inasmuch as it involves the difference between $92,000 and $145,000 in the cost of this work. The amendment was drawn, I believe, at the instance of the Commissioner of Patents and with his entire approval. I addressed the following letter to the Secretary of the Interior:

On the 20th instant the Committee on Patents unanimously reported back with an amendment the inclosed amendment intended to be proposed by myself to bill H. R. 6248. Said bill was reported to the Senate before the Committee on Appropriations received from the Committee on Patents my intended amendment with their favorable recommendation. When said bill is under consideration in the Senate, I will offer my amendment at the proper time, and in support of it desire to state to the Senate as to the acceptable manner in which Mr. Andrew B. Graham has performed his contract for the publication of the Patent Office Gazette and all photolithographic work falling within the scope of his contract with the Commissioner of Patents. I respectfully ask for information on the following points:

1. Has said Graham complied fully with the specifications of his contract?
2. Has said Graham delayed the Department at any time in its prompt issue of the Official Gazette?
3. Has the said Graham's work at all times been up to the required standard?
4. Do you regard the work performed by said Graham as being equal or superior to that of former contractors?

Please reply to the foregoing questions not later than to-morrow.

In reply I received the following letter from the Commissioner of Patents, sent to me by the Secretary of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference of this date, of the letter of Hon. J. H. KYLE, dated March 23, 1896, inclosing proposed amendment to H. R. 6248, relative to the photolithographic work for the Patent Office, and requesting certain information respecting the manner in which the work is now performed by the present contractor, Mr. Andrew B. Graham, of this city.

In reply to your request for a report I beg to say that Mr. Graham has fully complied with the specifications of his contract; that at no time has the issue of the Official Gazette been delayed since his contract with this office; that the work furnished by Mr. Graham has been up to the required standard, and that this office regards the work performed by Mr. Graham as being fully equal to that performed by former contractors.

The papers received by your reference are herewith returned.

Very respectfully, yours,

S. T. FISHER, Acting Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

I wish to state that Mr. Graham received the past year, I believe, $92,000 for the publication of this work. In the document, which is Senate Report No. 1047, upon page 5, I find a letter from the Norris Peters Company to the Commissioner of Patents relative to the cost of publishing the work. I will read one paragraph from it, which is as follows:

It may not be improper for us to say, in this connection, that on but three occasions since we first contracted to furnish copies of Patent Office drawings other parties, apparently without any knowledge or experience in the matter, have attempted to do the work at prices below those bid by our establishment, and the result on each occasion fully warrants us in saying that the work can not be done satisfactorily at prices less than those bid by us, if the high standard of work required by your office is to be maintained, as two of the contracts referred to were annulled and the third was only fulfilled after causing much annoyance, trouble, and delay, not only to the Government, but to inventors and attorneys as well.

That is the judgment of the Norris Peters Company. Now, let me say that the Norris Peters Company had this contract from 1877 to 1893, and during that time, in the terms of the language of this letter, they received annually $145,000 for the work. In 1893 they received $145,000. In 1895 they bid $103,000. Mr. Graham stepped in and bid $92,000, and received from the Secretary of the Interior the contract. Mr. Graham has gone to a great expense in putting in his plant, and now after one year's work it is thought advisable that the Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized, in his discretion, to continue the contract with this company for a period of four years. The other company had the contract for a period of seventeen or eighteen years at $145,000 a year. When a new company goes to the expense of placing in a large plant, I think it is no more than just and right that if the Secretary of the Interior finds they have done excellent work and complied fully with his requirements he should have the privilege of extending the contract for a period of four years, and in doing so I do not think we enact new legislation or in any way change the existing statutes in the case. I believe it merely enables the Secretary of the Interior to carry out as best he can and as best he sees fit the present statutes as they exist.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KYLE. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator spoke of the previous contract having run on for some seventeen years. Will he kindly inform me if he knows how long a specific contract was ever made with that firm? Was it from year to year, or were four-year contracts made?

Mr. KYLE. I think the plan heretofore adopted has been to make a yearly contract with that company. But allow me to say that during all this time I believe there is but one company in town that had a plant sufficient to produce that great work, the Patent Office Gazette. It requires special presses; it requires a large investment of capital to do the work, and now, after the Norris Peters Company had the contract for about seventeen years at $145,000 a year, and I understand have made perhaps a million dollars of money or more out of it, they are able to drive out every other person.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is that company now in existence?

Mr. KYLE. It is now in existence, I believe.

Mr. CHANDLER. And did it compete for this contract?

Mr. KYLE. Last year. Last year they made an offer to do the work for $103,000. The present company bid for it at $92,000 and received the contract.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator propose that this contract shall be continued for four years without any reletting?

Mr. KYLE. At $92,000 or less, if the Secretary of the Interior shall see fit.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator will see that we do not get any competition there. I can conceive that it might be judicious to make a contract for four years, as we do for carrying the mails, but I do not think it would be wise to kill off competition for one year and then by legislation extend the contract for four years. The Senator certainly can not think that that is good business sense.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. KYLE. I do, most certainly, and I will explain it in a moment. I yield now to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. In reply to what the Senator from New Hampshire has said, I think one point should be alluded to.

This work cost the Government, when there was not so much of it, about $150,000 a year under the old arrangement. The contract now is for $92,000 a year, a saving of nearly $60,000 a year over what the Government has been paying for many years. A young man who bid less than the Norris Peters Company by $11,000 and got this one-year contract has come forward and invested about $100,000 in order to carry it out. It is perfectly apparent that if it is opened the Norris Peters Company can do it next year for $50,000 perhaps, but they will destroy the only concern in Washington that can compete with them, and then they will have it at their own rate thereafter. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then competition is to be abolished for the fear of a future injury by reason of the destruction of one of the competing establishments.

Mr. KYLE. It is rather to establish competition in the city. That is the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. How does it establish competition?

Mr. KYLE. By enabling another firm to get upon its feet.

Mr. CHANDLER. To extend a one-year contract for four years by act of Congress?

Mr. KYLE. To enable another firm to get upon its feet and then be able to compete. I understand that the Norris Peters Company, in consideration of the large amount of money which they have made from the publication of this work, are able to do it for one or two years at $50,000 a year in order to drive the other company from the field, and then they will have the whole field before them, as they had during a number of years past.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is this discussion proceeding on the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question on the point of order is before the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has always been a rule that you could not discuss a point of order. However, a point of order always is discussed, and the Senator from South Dakota having the floor, I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island ought to interrupt him, particularly as I want to take a little part in the discussion myself. It seems to me that a discussion of this kind ought to be interrupted by a point of order in the inception and not right in the middle of it.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I tried to interrupt it, but failed.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator knows on a question of order the merits of a proposition are always discussed in the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. That is frequently the case; when you break the rule it is.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not courteous in the Senate to break up a system because there is a rule against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order.

Mr. KYLE. Now, I will speak on the point of order for just a moment. I made a statement to the Senator in charge of the bill a moment ago to the effect that we have sat here during the whole consideration of the bill and witnessed amendment after amendment go upon the bill, which amendments were plainly new legislation and plainly changing existing law. I call the attention of the Senator to one or two on page 90, at the bottom, and at the top of page 91.

The Commissioner of Education is hereby authorized to prepare and publish a bulletin of the Bureau of Education as to the condition of higher education, technical and industrial education, etc.—

In this country and abroad.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator saw that the rule was violated, why did he not make the point of order? He had a right to do it?

Mr. KYLE. I have seen it done year after year, and there is never any question raised as to placing these amendments on the bill provided they have been approved by some standing committee of the Senate. That is all that is required.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is obliged to confine its ruling to the case in point and not to the other cases on which no point of order has been raised. The Chair suggests to the Senator that he confine his remarks to the pending question.

Mr. KYLE. I will state in reference to the pending amendment that I do not see in reading it through that there is any change of existing law.

Mr. PLATT. I do not want to ask a hypothetical question, but I should like to know if the provision from lines 11 to 16, to which this is offered as an amendment, is not new legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is precisely the question pending before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. CULLOM. That provision is according to the present law, I understand.

Mr. PLATT. I beg pardon; it is not according to the present law.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not sure about it, but I think it is.

Mr. PLATT. The present law is that the work may be done at the Government Printing Office, in the judgment of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the same as it is here.

Mr. PLATT. No; it is not the same; I beg pardon.

Mr. CULLOM. What is the matter with it?

Mr. PLATT. But this provision is——

Or if there shall be no joint committee, in the judgment of the Committee on Printing of either House.

That clause is interpolated into the bill, changing the law on the subject entirely.

Mr. CULLOM. Even if that be so, if I may be allowed to refer to the other branch of Congress, when the House incorporates a provision into the bill and it comes here it is not in order to make a point of order on it and to strike it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order. He does not wish to deprive the Senator from South Dakota of the opportunity to express his views.

Mr. KYLE. I will await the decision of the Chair on the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota has offered an amendment. The Senator from Illinois raises the point of order against it under Rule XVI, paragraph 3:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

This is a positive rule and allows of no modification. The Chair is satisfied, upon an examination of the latter part of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota, that it is general legislation, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. KYLE. While upon my feet I wish to say that I intend to remember Rule XVI, and I intend to see that it is rigidly applied so long as the rest of the appropriation bills remain under consideration in the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator can announce what he intends to do, either in the Senate or anywhere else. That does not control my action in the premises in reference to these measures.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to propose an amendment on page 8, beginning at line 4, the first paragraph for contingent expenses. I move to strike out all after the word "namely," in line 4, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 7, and to insert what I read:

For stationery for committees, to be drawn only on requisition approved by the chairman thereof, $5,000. For stationery for Senators, to be drawn only on requisition signed by the Senators themselves, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be required. And after the 30th day of June, 1896, no articles shall be kept in the stationery room for the use of Senators other than paper, ink, pens, pencils, inkstands, blank books, blank forms, and such other things as are required in the official work of Senators.

Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes in support of this amendment; and it is not done for the purpose of calling attention to any impropriety or any unnecessary extravagances or anything of that kind. It seems to me that we can very wisely dispense with a great many articles that are now kept in the stationery room, articles that Senators do not use themselves, articles that are not needed for the official work of Senators, and are used for other purposes altogether; and that now is a good time—and we are the men to perform the work—to reduce these expenses, and this amendment will do it.

I will state one reason, and a very important one, why I think the amendment is good and ought to prevail. I find that we have 46 standing committees of the Senate, and in addition to the 46 standing committees we have 13 special or select committees, making a total of 59 committees. Every one of the committees has been in the practice of drawing such stationery as it needs, and in the amendment $5,000 is appropriated, which is the same amount that is appropriated by the committee, "$5,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate." So a large number of Senators, 59 of us, are chairmen of committees. We draw under the general lump appropriation the stationery for our committees, which leaves the difference between 90 and 59, which is but 31 Senators who would draw upon their own individual requisition. Senators know very well that a large amount of stationery that we use as individual Senators we use while at work in our committee rooms. Probably there is no member of the body who is not a member of at least five or six different committees, and we use in that way a large amount of committee stationery, and hence do not use as much for our own personal use as we would otherwise do.

I shall not call attention to the other articles that I find specified under property in charge of the Secretary of the Senate, but simply submit this matter to the Senate with the concluding remark that this is a good time and we are the proper persons to effect this reform.

Mr. CULLOM. Before I make the point of order upon the amendment, I simply desire to say that there is nothing in the stationery room that we get that we do not pay for. Everything that is kept in that department which is not under the law for the use of committees, etc., if obtained by any Senator or anyone else, has to be paid for. I certainly am sure that I never got anything out of that establishment that was not charged to me and that I did not settle for at the proper time.

Mr. PEFFER. Certainly the Senator from Illinois does not wish to be understood that the cost within the sum of $125 comes out of the pockets of Senators. I see, not in a large number of cases, it is true, that Senators have gone and drawn in actual cash the difference between the value of the stationery they have drawn and the $125 allowed for that purpose. This amendment is to dispense with the annual allowance for stationery. The object of the amendment is simply to limit the amount of stationery used by Senators to that which they actually do need and use, and not allow them pocketbooks and penknives and things of that kind, which we ought to buy ourselves.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the amendment of the Senator is out of order. I waited for my distinguished friend from South Dakota to make the point of order, but I do not see him present.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Kansas propose to do away with the allowance for stationery to Senators?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Entirely?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes; so that Senators shall be allowed just the amount they use, and only that for their own personal use.

Mr. ALDRICH. And the $125 allowance is to be repealed?

Mr. HOAR. It is not $125, I think.

Mr. PEFFER. The amendment, if it should be adopted, would abolish the annual allowance.

Mr. ALDRICH. So that every Senator could get what he wanted without limit?

Mr. PEFFER. So that what stationery we actually use we shall be allowed.

Mr. HOAR. I think the allowance is $75.

Mr. COCKRELL. No; $125.

Mr. CULLOM. One hundred and twenty-five dollars is the amount allowed.

Mr. TELLER. I understand each Senator is allowed $125 per annum for stationery, postage stamps, and things of that kind.

Mr. PEFFER. Oh, no; not postage stamps.

Mr. TELLER. He is entitled to that amount if he chooses to take it. I do not remember exactly the language of the statute. The stationery is not for his personal use, but for his official use. The Senator from Kansas speaks about the stationery being for the personal use of Senators.

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator will understand that I did not mean to say it was in that particular form. I mean what each Senator uses as an individual Senator, and not as chairman of a committee.

Mr. TELLER. Last year I remember that I obtained some stationery from the stationery room, and when I got through I had a bill of $13 to pay the Government for the stationery I had drawn. Ordinarily I buy a portion of my stationery outside of the stationery room, because I can do better outside; that is to say, I can, as a rule, better suit myself outside than I can there. Last year I did not do that, but I have done so perhaps every other year. Sometimes when I have done that there may have been to my credit some amount which I had the right to take, because I had already expended more than that outside for stationery. I take to my rooms—never from my committee, but from that which is charged to me or that which I buy at the bookstores—large quantities of paper and envelopes, which I use to write letters that are purely official. I do not suppose that I have ever since I have been in the Senate made any distinction when I wrote to my mother or my friends. I use what paper I have. I do not think those things ought to be considered in the Senate. When I go home to Colorado, as has been suggested to me by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I always use the paper that I buy in the community where I am situated—at Denver.

Mr. President, I do not think that these things are worthy of the attention of the Senate. I do not believe that members of the Senate are stealing stationery; and I must say, with all due deference to the Senator from Kansas, that this seems to me very small business for the American Senate to be engaged in. We waste time here, which, if devoted to the public service, would save a much larger amount of money than would be saved if every Senator bought his stationery and paid for it out of his own pocket. I know of no reason why he should. I think when I am engaged in official business I am entitled to have the necessary stationery. That has always been the rule of the Senate, and I have never heard of its being abused. I think it is rather unfortunate that we should spend our time over little matters of this kind.

Mr. FAULKNER. I certainly think, from my experience, that there can not be any claim upon the part of the Senator from Kansas that the amount allowed is excessive for the purposes specified in the bill. I am satisfied that under his amendment the appropriation would have to be enlarged rather than curtailed. Taking myself, for example, I have frequently exceeded the allowance, and the last year or the year before to the amount of $57.

Mr. CULLOM. Which the Senator paid into the Treasury.

Mr. FAULKNER. Which I paid into the Treasury at the end of the year. The clerk in charge of the stationery room stated that I had drawn that amount over my allowance. If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas be adopted, I am satisfied it will be necessary to enlarge the appropriation rather than to reduce it.

Mr. KYLE. I think this is new legislation, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. That is right.

Mr. KYLE. And that Rule XVI applies to it.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I do not think that Senators understand the object of the amendment.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, I regret that the Populist party is divided upon this very important question. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I ask only for the usual courtesy extended in such cases. I do not think the Senate understands the object of the amendment. I began by saying that it was not my intention to call attention to any alleged extravagance, or anything of that kind, but to call attention to what I regarded as a substantial reform.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] speaks harshly, and, I think, under the circumstances, unkindly toward me, a fellow-Senator, who has always been courteous and respectful to the Senator not only officially, but personally, and although my idea may not strike Senators as being just what it ought to be to begin with, yet to present it is a right I have here. What I want Senators to understand is this: That the amount of stationery which we use in our official business we ought to have by an appropriation for that purpose. The people ought to furnish us with all the stationery we need.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PEFFER. In a moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do we need an unlimited amount of stationery?

Mr. PEFFER. No; we do not need an unlimited amount.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it not a good deal like the Senator's proposition to issue money to an unlimited amount? [Laughter.]

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me if I do not allow him to run me off to another issue. I shall try to keep myself together. [Laughter.] I think the people are willing to pay, and ought to pay, for all the stationery which their public men need.

But, now that the subject is being made light of, I find in our stationery room that we use pocketbooks, we use combination cases, we use gold pens, we use fountain pens, we use a thousand and one articles which we do not need at all in the public service.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And we pay for them.

Mr. PEFFER. We will see about that in a moment.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I know I do.

Mr. PEFFER. What we use of those things within the limit of the allowance we pay for out of the public Treasury. I have myself paid as high as $60 in one year over and above the usual annual allowance; but that was not all for stationery. I go down to the stationery room, and so do we all, when Christmas time comes, and buy various articles, penknives, for instance, for my boys or for my friends, or pocketbooks, combination cases, and all those things. They all go into our account.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PEFFER. Not now.

We all purchase more than we are entitled to under the annual allowance of $125. Of course we pay for such purchases out of our own pockets. What I am trying to get at is a careful, cautious, prudent, businesslike use of whatever we need for public purposes, and let the rest pass, so that, whatever we need, let it be paid for out of the public Treasury, and dispense with those articles which occasion so much criticism in the public press.

Mr. HOAR. I call for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. TELLER. I disclaim any intention of injuring the feelings of the Senator from Kansas, or of being in any way harsh toward him. I did not suppose I was. I supposed I was, for me, unusually mild. [Laughter.] I only wanted to say that it seemed to me that this subject was not big enough to attract the attention of the Senate, unless it was apparent that there had been some abuses of which I had never heard before. I knew the amount allowed to me for stationery had never covered the expenditure it was intended to cover. I will not, however, go into any discussion of it. I will merely say that I did not intend to interfere with the Senator's freedom of speech, nor did I intend to offend him; and if I did so, I regret it. I repeat, however, that I think we ought to let these little matters alone and attend to the weightier matters of legislation.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I raise the question of order, that this discussion is entirely out of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to speak to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state his point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to speak to the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the privilege of the Chair to hear arguments when a point of order is raised.

Mr. HOAR. I ask if the Chair will hear arguments that are not on the question of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order has just been raised by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. It was raised by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had not so understood. The remark made by the Senator from South Dakota was that the amendment was general legislation, but he did not insist on any point of order.

Mr. CULLOM. I made the point of order early after the question came before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so understand. The Chair will hear the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] on the point of order.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; I do not wish to speak to the point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Here is an appropriation of the Senate for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate. It is entirely competent for the Senate when considering that clause to regulate the whole subject of stationery expenditure. Any provision as to what shall be done with the money appropriated for stationery, how the stationery room shall be handled, controlled, and managed, and what things shall be kept there I do not find written out in any existing law. Perhaps the Senator from South Dakota or the Senator from Massachusetts knows of some law which tells exactly what is to be kept in the stationery room. I do not; but it seems to me an absolutely unknown limitation upon the power of the Senate, when it is going to appropriate five or ten or fifteen thousand dollars for stationery, to say that you can not direct how that stationery money shall be expended.

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we shall first dispose of these little matters.

Mr. FRYE. Let us dispose of this very important piece of business, at least. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULLOM. We do not want to discuss points of order tomorrow. I think the Chair is ready to decide the question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The attention of the Chair has not been directed to any statute regulating this matter, and there is no proposition to repeal any general law or to make any general law, but merely to regulate the practice of the Senate with reference to stationery.

Mr. CULLOM. I think there is a general statute which controls the subject.

Mr. HOAR. This is a proposition to make a new law.

Mr. CULLOM. It is to change a law, and make a new arrangement by which the stationery room shall be governed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair looks upon it as an attempt to regulate a subject in connection with the contingent expenses of the Senate, and the paragraph on page 8 is for that purpose. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 4, after the word "namely," it is proposed to strike out all of the paragraph down to and including the word "dollars," in line 7, as follows:

For stationery and newspapers, including $5,000 for stationery for committees and officers of the Senate, $16,250.

And insert:

For stationery for committees, to be drawn only upon requisition approved by the chairmen thereof, $5,000.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Chair rules that the amendment is in order, I hope we shall vote it down without further discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to have attention called to any statute which regulates that matter. The Chair is not advised that there is any such statute.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. CULLOM). Withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the point of order for the purpose of getting a vote on the question. I move that the amendment be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I move to amend, in line 13, on page 96, by striking out the word "five" and inserting the word "eight," and in line 14 by striking out the word "seven" and inserting "ten."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, line 13, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "eight," and in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "ten"; so as to read:

For surveyor-general of Oregon, $2,000, and for the clerks in his office, $8,000; in all, $10,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not desire to interfere with any remarks the Senator from Oregon desires to make, but I wish to state that, so far as I am concerned, I should be willing to give that office the amount of the estimates by the Government, which is $6,700. I am willing, so far as I am personally concerned, to allow the amount to be changed to the full extent of the estimates by the Treasury Department. If the Senator is willing to take that, I shall not object, but the amendment is subject to a point of order beyond doubt. I hope the Senator will accept the suggestion.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order. Notice was given of it yesterday, and it has been offered by direction of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true, but still that does not bring it within the rule.

Mr. MCBRIDE. In view of the suggestions made to me by Senators who are members of the Committee on Public Lands, I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing to allow the "$5,000" for clerk hire in the office of the surveyor-general of Oregon to be changed to "$6,700," and the total changed accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated in that form.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, in line 13, after the word "office," it is proposed to strike out "$5,000," and insert "$6,700"; and in line 14, after the word "all," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$8,700"; so as to make the clause read:

For surveyor-general of Oregon, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $6,700; in all, $8,700.

Mr. MCBRIDE. As showing the necessity for the increase, I send two letters to the Secretary's desk, which I ask to have printed.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letters referred to will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., March 6, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: The Oregon and California Railroad Company, through Mr. George H. Andrews, made application to this office on February 7, 1896, for the survey of 30 whole and fractional townships within the limits of their land grant in Oregon under act of Congress March 2, 1895. Copy of this application was forwarded to the honorable Commissioner General Land Office, and I have been authorized to have the surveys executed, and posted notice on the 2d instant requesting proposals. The estimated cost of this work is something over $22,000, which, added to the regular apportionment of $10,000 for Oregon, makes $32,000 to be expended for public surveys during the present fiscal year.

Based upon the regular appropriations of $10,000, there was appropriated for salaries of the surveyor-general and his clerks for the fiscal year 1895 and 1896, $7,000. With this amount I am only able to employ one draftsman. When the returns of the surveys now authorized are returned to this office, I shall be obliged, under the present situation, to execute the office work in connection therewith with my present clerical force, which is wholly inadequate, and would result in returns remaining here until the funds available for the payment of a portion of this work at least reverted back to the Treasury under the existing law, which would work a great hardship upon the deputies who execute the work. I earnestly request that you exert your influence in the direction of an increase in the appropriation for salaries for this office of at least $5,000, making the total $12,000.

I have written the honorable Commissioner General Land Office upon the subject, who, I have no doubt, will concur in recommendation.

Will you please let me have your views in relation to this matter at your early convenience?

Yours, very truly, JOHN C. ARNOLD,
United States Surveyor-General for Oregon.

HON. GEORGE W. MCBRIDE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1896.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 20th instant in relation to the application from the surveyor-general of Oregon for an increase of the appropriation for clerical assistance in his office. In reply I have to state that in response to a communication from the surveyor-general he was informed on March 12 as follows:

"Referring to your letter of the 5th instant, asking that the appropriation of $5,000 provided for clerks in your office in the ensuing fiscal year may be increased to $10,000, you are informed that the estimate submitted by the Department was for $6,700 for such service, which is the sum estimated for by you on June 18, 1895, but the House Committee on Appropriations reduced the amount to $5,000, and this sum remained in the act which has been passed by the House.

"It is very doubtful if Congress will permit any increase in the appropriation for your office, but if found practicable a supplemental estimate will be submitted."

As you ask for an early report in the matter, so that you may submit an amendment to the appropriation bill now pending in the Senate, I have to state that while this office is not definitely informed as to the amount of work necessary to be done in the office of the surveyor-general on account of the additional surveys provided by the act of March 2, 1895, it is submitted that if an increase of $3,000 in the amount now given in the pending bill, making $8,000 instead of $5,000 for clerical help, it may meet the urgent requirements of that office, but it is apprehended that asking an increase to $10,000, as indicated by the surveyor-general, might be rejected, whereas the smaller sum may perhaps be conceded.

Very respectfully, S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

HON. GEORGE W. MCBRIDE,
United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 97, in line 11, I move to strike out the word "four" and insert "seven," and in line 12 to strike out the word "six" and insert the word "nine."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, page 97, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "four" and insert "seven," and in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "nine"; so as to read:

For surveyor-general of Wyoming, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $7,800; in all, $9,800.

Mr. CULLOM. I make no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BATE. On page 89, line 2, I move to strike out "eighteen hundred" and insert "two thousand." I hope the Senator who has the bill in charge will agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the appropriations for "Bureau of Education," on page 89, line 2, after the word "statistician," it is proposed to strike out "eighteen hundred" and insert "two thousand"; so as to read:

Statistician, $2,000.

Mr. BATE. I beg to state in regard to this officer that I think he is the only statistician in the Government—around Washington at least—who gets such a small salary as that. It is merely the salary of a clerk, and that much was given when the office was established, when it was merely a baby institution, in 1873. It has been very much enlarged and volumes of books come from there. The statistician has great labor to perform, and not only that, but the office has been increased. The larger part of the whole Educational Bureau force is now under him as the statistician, and he is acting also as chief of division as well as clerk. I think $200 is a small increase to the head of a division. I believe the head of each division in the Interior Department—I think this office is attached to that Department—gets $2,000 or $2,200, and the statisticians in the other Departments—for instance, in the Agricultural Bureau—get $2,500. I think this a very marked injustice to this officer. He certainly ought to have this little increase of $200, and that is all I ask.

Mr. CULLOM. I should be very glad indeed to yield to the appeal of the Senator from Tennessee, but the amount named in the bill is exactly the amount estimated by the Department, and it would be hardly proper to increase it in this way.

Mr. BATE. I beg to say in reply that the chief there has heretofore attempted, in the last two or three years perhaps, to secure an increase, but failed to get it. He did not want to make the appeal again, because he understood this was a very economical Administration, and he so states. But that does not affect the question. Here is the case of a man who is acting as chief of division, with a large force under him, and getting no more salary now than he received at the beginning of the institution, when it was a very small one. I think there can be no doubt that the amount ought to be increased.

Mr. CULLOM. It is beyond the estimates of the Department.

Mr. BATE. Suppose it is. It has been done in half a dozen cases this evening.

Mr. CULLOM. We are trying to keep below the estimates, if possible.

Mr. BATE. The last thing you did was to go beyond the estimate. So I trust the Senator will not make that rule on me now.

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing to have a vote on the amendment without any discussion.

Mr. BATE. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. In the line immediately preceding the one in which the amendment was just adopted, line 1, page 89, after the words "chief clerk," I move to strike out "$1,800" and to insert "$2,000" in place thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 89, in line 1, after the words "chief clerk," it is proposed to strike out "$1,800," and insert "$2,000"; so as to read:

Chief clerk, $2,000.

Mr. CULLOM. If we are going to increase the salaries of all the chief clerks in the Departments beyond the estimates, we might as well understand it and go ahead on that line.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I desire to say that amendment is moved for the reason that this officer is made by law the executive officer of the Bureau of Education. In the absence of the Commissioner, by law he is the Acting Commissioner. He is the superior officer of all others in that Department, save alone the Commissioner. The Commissioner is paid $3,000 a year. In addition to that, all chiefs of bureaus are paid exceeding $1,800, and the chiefs of all the divisions are paid $1,800. This officer is higher than the chief of a division, and I think it is proper that, as he is the superior officer, he should receive this increased compensation.

Mr. CULLOM. I raise the point of order that this amendment is beyond the amount estimated for.

Mr. BACON. This officer is the superior officer of the statistician, to whom the Senate has just awarded the amount of $2,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is raised against the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I withdraw the point of order. I do not care to make discriminations between the two Senators who are trying to get these amendments. I will let the amendment be voted upon by the Senate and disposed of. I think, however, the Senate ought to give attention to it.

Mr. BACON. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. It proposes to increase the compensation of an officer who is the immediate superior of the officer to whom $2,000 has just been allowed.

Mr. CULLOM. No; the one to whom the Senate has just allowed $2,000 is a statistician and the other is simply a clerk. That is the difference.

Mr. BATE. I will come to the relief of the Senator from Georgia. What the Senator has said is true, but at the same time another officer who is inferior to the one who was just voted $2,000 gets $2,400 at the instance of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON obtained the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. If the amendments are all in, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to submit an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLATT. I move to adjourn. We are not going to get through with these amendments to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to present a brief amendment, which will only take a moment.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to have a total changed, resulting from the adoption of two amendments, on page 89, line 16, in the appropriation for the Bureau of Education. The total should be "$50,800" instead of "$50,420."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The total will be changed as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, in the absence of objection.

Mr. CANNON. In line 24, on page 96, before the word "thousand," I move to strike out "five" and insert "seven"; and in line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seven" and insert "nine."

Mr. CULLOM. I understand there are several other amendments to be proposed to the bill. I was hoping that we could get the bill cleared up, with the exception of the court provisions; but if other amendments are to be offered, I am inclined to yield to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. You can not do that. The bill is open to amendment until the entire bill has been considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 96, line 24, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "seven"; and in line 25, before the word "thousand" to strike out "seven" and insert "nine"; so as to read:

For surveyor-general of the State of Utah, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $7,000; in all, $9,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will not insist upon a vote on that amendment to-night. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. I will cheerfully do that, if the Senator desires, when I have explained the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will explain it to-morrow it will be better understood than if explained now in a thin Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Two amendments of a similar character, bringing the allowance of the surveyors-general up to the estimates of the Department, have just been passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I know it.

Mr. CANNON. If the Senator insists, of course I will allow the amendment to go over.

Mr. CULLOM. I think it will be better for the Senator to make his remarks in the morning.

Mr. CANNON. I have no remarks to make on the subject, because it is self-explanatory.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 25, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH PENALTY.

The SPEAKER. The first question before the House is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill the title of which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMS. Division.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 90; the noes are 35; the ayes seem to have it; the ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move to reconsider.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. On what question?

Mr. CROWTHER. On the question of the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. One moment. Had the gentleman risen for that purpose before the vote was announced?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 61, not voting 123; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was in the Hall of the House, and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman was not listening, under our rules he can not be allowed to vote now.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ought to say to the House that attention has been called to the rule in regard to the recording of names after the roll call. The Chair will have it read to the House, so that attention may be called to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Upon every roll call the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, in which case the name of the State shall be added; and if there be two such members from the same State, the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair unless the member's name has been noted under clause 3 of this rule.

The SPEAKER. The practice in the Fifty-first Congress, when the same rule prevailed, was to ask a member if he was listening at the time his name should have been called and failed to hear it, so as to meet the possible contingency that the calling of the name had been omitted. That is the condition of the rule as it stands at present.

Mr. LACEY. That rule is not different, except in the last clause, from what it was in the last Congress—

And thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote.

That is, after the roll has been called.

The SPEAKER. That was also the practice in the Fifty-first Congress. The Chair does not see how the rule can be otherwise interpreted.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. TRACEWELL with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. HICKS with Mr. MADDOX.

Mr. HADLEY with Mr. MCDEARMON.

Mr. HULICK with Mr. COX.

Mr. ODELL with Mr. RICHARDSON.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana with Mr. BAILEY.

Mr. HOOKER with Mr. MCCLELLAN.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana with Mr. WILSON of South Carolina.

Mr. HARDY with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. DALZELL with Mr. MCMILLIN.

Mr. EDDY with Mr. KYLE.

Mr. HUBBARD with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. MOODY with Mr. MINER of New York.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is announced that I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEONARD] upon this vote. That is a mistake. I was only paired with the gentleman on a matter that was disposed of Friday last. I voted on this question.

The SPEAKER. The pair will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills and resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2482) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to loan two condemned cannon to the Confederate Home of Missouri, located at Higginsville, Lafayette County, Mo.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2187) to pension Thomas F. Leahy—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 2132) for the relief of settlers upon lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 2037) to provide times and places for holding terms of United States courts in Utah—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 2032) to grant right of way over the public domain for pipe lines in the States of Colorado and Wyoming—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 1989) to authorize the payment to Rear-Admiral John H. Russell of the highest pay of his grade—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 1806) granting a pension to George B. Custer, late sergeant of Company H, Seventy-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A bill (S. 1723) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge over and across Caddo Lake, at Mooringsport, La., by the Kansas City, Shreveport and Gulf Railway Company—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A bill (S. 1312) to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Smallwood and the soldiers of the Maryland line in the war for American independence—to the Committee on the Library.

A bill (S. 662) for the relief of William S. Grant—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 637) granting a pension to George M. Brooks—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 2141) to amend an act approved August 24, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize purchasers of the property and franchises of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to organize a corporation and to confer upon the same all the powers, privileges, and franchises vested in that company"—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 12,000 additional copies of the report of the board of engineers relative to the construction and completion of the Nicaragua Canal, without maps, of which 4,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—

To the Committee on Printing.

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 17, of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, being the memorial of the National Woolgrowers' Association; of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives—

To the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound, at Salmon Bay, with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CUBA.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the message from the Senate announcing a disagreement with the House and requesting a further conference on the House amendments to the resolutions in relation to Cuba, and I move that the House insist upon its amendments to the resolutions of the Senate and agree to a conference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

The Speaker laid before the House a bill (H. R. 4463) to grant certain condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth and Forty-third Separate Companies National Guard of State of New York, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

The amendments were agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The points of order are reserved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PRICE, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WASHINGTON, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. HADLEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SORG, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCMILLIN, for five days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1616) to pension Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind.;

A bill (H. R. 3886) to reimburse W. W. Rockhill for moneys erroneously paid United States;

A bill (H. R. 5564) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5979) for the right of the Rock Island, Muscatine and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Illinois and Mississippi Canal;

A bill (H. R. 6304) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at Knoxville, Tenn.; and

A bill (6936) for the reconstruction of the Rock Island Bridge.

CALEB L. JACKSON.

Mr. HALTERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6417) to complete the military record of Caleb L. Jackson.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman whether this bill has been considered at a Friday night session?

Mr. HALTERMAN. No, sir; it is such a meritorious bill that it needs no elaborate consideration. This man died on the retreat from Manassas in 1863. He has been dead more than thirty years.

Mr. TALBERT. My question was whether the bill had been considered at a Friday night session.

Mr. HALTERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. TALBERT. Then I object.

MARITIME CANAL OF NORTH AMERICA.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, on the 4th of March I introduced a bill (H. R. 7173) "to incorporate the Maritime Canal of North America, and for other purposes," and, either by mistake or inadvertence on my part, it was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals. The bill relates entirely to interstate commerce, and should have been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce; and I ask that the reference be so changed.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that that bill is in the proper committee. I object to the change of reference.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the reference be changed.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman authorized by his committee?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No, sir.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1480) to amend an act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of an act entitled "An act to adjust the salaries of postmasters," approved March 3, 1883, be, and the same is hereby, amended so to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That the salaries of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be readjusted by the Postmaster-General, the first adjustment (under this act) to take effect simultaneously with the reduction of the rates of postage, and thereafter at the beginning of each fiscal year; and the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C., shall be $6,000; and in no case shall the salary of any postmaster exceed the sum of $6,000, except the city of New York, where the salary of the postmaster shall remain as now fixed by law at $8,000 per annum.

The committee recommended an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That the salary of the postmaster at Washington City, D. C., shall be $6,000 per annum, beginning the 1st of July, 1896.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement in relation to this bill. It is unanimously reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I desire to say in this connection that the salary of the postmaster at Washington is fixed by statute at a specific sum. The salaries of the other Presidential postmasters are fixed by law according to the receipts of their offices. In 1882 the salary of the postmaster at Washington was fixed at $5,000 a year. At that time the receipts of the office would have entitled him to only about $3,700. As the members of this House well know, 60 per cent of the business at the Washington office is free business, for which no stamps are sold. The Postmaster-General has written a letter, in which he shows the gross discrimination which is made against the postmaster in the city of Washington in comparison with the postmasters at other large offices. In 1882 the receipts of the post-office at Washington amounted to $292,756. That was the gross receipts from the sale of stamps. In 1894 the receipts amounted to $586,866. Now, when the receipts of an office amount to $600,000, the salary of the postmaster is fixed by law at $6,000 a year. In 1882 there were only 160 clerks under the control of the postmaster at Washington; now there are 303. At that time there were only 2 carrier stations; now there are 6. In 1882–83 there were 4 substations; now there are 34; in 1882–83 there were 24 stamp agencies; now there are 42.

Now, let us compare the salary of the postmaster in this city with the salary of other postmasters according to the work done. Take, for instance, Buffalo, N. Y., where there are employed 138 clerks, while at Washington there are 303 clerks, for whom the postmaster is responsible. The postmaster at Pittsburg, Pa., has only 156 clerks; at Cleveland, Ohio, 119.

Now, 60 per cent of the business of the Washington post-office is free. This is the third largest registry office in the United States, only New York and Chicago surpassing it. Let me say also that the receipts of the Washington office lack only about $14,000 of being $600,000, the maximum which under the general law, if applied to the post-office at Washington, would give the postmaster a salary of $6,000.

Mr. PICKLER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. This bill, I believe, proposes to increase the salary of the postmaster here in Washington.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the amount of the proposed increase?

Mr. SWANSON. One thousand dollars.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the bill give anything additional to fourth-class postmasters?

Mr. SWANSON. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

Several members called for the regular order.

CUBA.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HITT, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the concurrent resolutions with reference to Cuba.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the committees will be called for business in the morning hour.

FRAUDULENT BRANDS UPON LIQUORS IN BOTTLES, ETC.

Mr. EVANS (when the Committee on Ways and Means was called). I have been instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to bring to the attention of the House during this call the bill (H. R. 4580) to amend section 3449 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3449 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3449. Whenever any person sells, or keeps on hand for sale, ships, transports, or removes any spirituous or fermented liquors or wines, whether foreign or domestic, in bottles, casks, or other packages, under any other than the proper name or brand known to the trade as designating the kind and quality of the contents of the bottles, casks, or other packages containing the same, or causes such act to be done, he shall forfeit said liquors or wines and bottles, casks, or other packages, and be subject to pay a fine of $500, and to be imprisoned six months for the first offense, and to pay a fine of $1,000 and be imprisoned one year for the second offense."

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "person," in line 5, insert "knowingly"; so that section 3449, as proposed to be amended, will read: "whenever any person knowingly sells or keeps on hand," etc.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as will be seen from its title, is designed to amend section 3449 of the Revised Statutes. It relates exclusively to internal-revenue matters, and the bill as recommended by the committee has been indorsed and urged by the Internal Revenue Office. The section proposed to be amended now reads:

SEC. 3449. Whenever any person ships, transports, or removes any spirituous or fermented liquors or wines, under any other than the proper name or brand known to the trade as designating the kind and quality of the contents of the casks or packages containing same, or causes such act to be done, he shall forfeit said liquors or wines, and casks or packages, and be subject to pay a fine of $500.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a letter to the Committee on Ways and Means, has stated that the law as now on the statute books is inadequate to prevent and punish the gross and extensive frauds now constantly being perpetrated upon the public and upon the revenue by persons engaged in the sale of a great variety of liquors. For example, these persons send out in bottles (which must necessarily be beyond the scrutiny of the internal-revenue officers) a sort of beer that they call "hop tea"; and various other devices of the same kind are resorted to for the purpose of swindling not only the public but the revenue. In some of the larger cities some of these spurious liquors as bottled are designated on the brands as "cognac"; and the use of illustrious names of brandy makers is resorted to for the purpose of foisting upon the public these spurious liquors.

In order to prevent these frauds it is necessary, in the estimation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that we should get at the bottles. It is through the bottling establishments that the frauds are effected. This bill proposes to amend the existing law in such respects as may be necessary to prevent and punish the frauds now so extensively perpetrated. The changes which it is proposed to make in the law are such as in the judgment of the committee and of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are necessary. If gentlemen will follow the original section as I read the section in its amended form, they will see the changes which it is proposed to make.

Whenever any person knowingly sells or keeps on hand for sale—

The words "knowingly sells or keeps on hand for sale" are an addition—ships, transports, or removes any spirituous or fermented liquors or wines, whether foreign or domestic, in bottles, casks, or other packages, under any other than the proper name or brand known to the trade as designating the kind and quality of the contents of the bottles—

There we have inserted additional words—

casks, or other packages containing the same, or causes such act to be done, he shall forfeit said liquors or wines and bottles—

Which is not in the present law—

casks, or other packages, and be subject to a fine of $500.

The amendment proposed also adds to those words the following—and to be imprisoned six months for the first offense, and to pay a fine of $1,000 and be imprisoned one year for the second offense.

Imprisonment is regarded as absolutely necessary to prevent these frauds. They are being perpetrated not only upon the public by the sale of spurious liquors, but also upon the Government, by the sending abroad of these spurious cognacs and other spurious brands, which take the places of those genuine ones which would otherwise be imported at a much higher rate of duty than the internal-revenue taxation.

The committee were unanimously of the opinion that the bill ought to pass, and they give their reasons at length in the report. They think there is no reason why the suggestions of the Internal Revenue Office should not be carried into effect by the enactment of the law.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I wish, with the consent of the gentleman in charge of this bill, to call the attention of the House to this fact——

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. EVANS. Does the gentleman from New York desire to occupy the floor?

Mr. CUMMINGS. For a short time.

Mr. EVANS. I will yield to the gentleman from New York five minutes, if that will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from New York proceeds, the Chair will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that the reading of the report is not a matter of right except as a part of the remarks of some gentleman occupying the floor, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. EVANS. I ask that the report be read in my time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will yield the floor for the purpose of having the report read.

The report (by Mr. EVANS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4580) to amend section 3449 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, having considered the same, respectfully recommend the passage of the bill when amended as follows:

In line 5, after the word "person," insert the word "knowingly."

The existing statute is as follows:

"SEC. 3449. Whenever any person ships, transports, or removes any spirituous or fermented liquors or wines under any other than the proper name or brand known to the trade as designating the kind and quality of the contents of the casks or packages containing same, or causes such act to be done, he shall forfeit said liquors or wines and casks or packages and be subject to pay a fine of $500."

The Internal Revenue Office reports that the existing statute is inadequate to meet and correct the gross and extensive frauds perpetrated upon the public and upon the revenue by persons engaged in the sale of a great variety of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors under false and fraudulent brands. To illustrate, but without going into details, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports that in many districts lager beer is found upon the market under such names as "hop tea" and "ambrosia" as well as other false designations, and that domestic distilled spirits are found to have been sent out and sold under names which falsely indicate that the spirits are imported.

Such names as "Booth & Co., London superior," "Old Tom gin," and "J. & F. Martell cognac" are freely used, and the public is extensively imposed upon thereby, so much so indeed, it is said, that the profits are so great that those engaged in the business when detected pay apparently without reluctance the fine imposed by the statute. In the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, in the case of The United States vs. 133 packages of spirits, recently decided, it was held that goods sent out under such false brands can not be forfeited. There would therefore seem to be much need of the proposed legislation and for the imposition of greatly increased penalties, including imprisonment. This alone, it is believed by the officials and those well acquainted with the facts, will deter those engaged in these fraudulent transactions from actively continuing therein.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I will consume the time of the House only long enough to call attention to the fact that this bill, if passed, will not only be a protection to the revenue service of the country, but will also conduce to the safety of American citizens.

Last summer a friend of mine was very sick in New York. The doctor ordered him to use Hennessey brandy. "Get the three-star Hennessey brandy," he said to me. "That is what is required in his case."

"Well, I went to a drug store—it was Sunday—and got the three-star Hennessey brandy. Before leaving the doctor tasted it, and said, "Where did you get that?"

I replied at such and such a place on Broadway. "Well," he said, "that will kill at 40 rods. It is a compound of wood alcohol, whisky, and strychnine, sold under the label of Hennessey brandy."

I only instance this as indicating the necessity for the passage of this bill. If the revenue is robbed under the present law, it is a misfortune; but if people are killed by these noxious and poisonous compounds to put money into the pockets of greedy citizens, it is a crime. I need say no more. The justice of the measure is manifest. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, and will state the reasons for doing so.

Mr. EVANS. If the gentleman wishes to occupy the floor I will yield him time.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Are you parceling out the time in opposition to the bill?

Mr. EVANS. No, I am not; I am simply holding the floor.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill as it stands.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Kentucky yielded the floor?

Mr. EVANS. I have not. That is the reason I interrogated the gentleman as to what time he wanted. I will yield to him as much time as he desires within reasonable limits.

Mr. CONNOLLY. In opposition to the bill?

Mr. EVANS. Yes, if you so desire. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in taking the floor was to ask the House to amend the bill. If the gentleman in charge of the bill insists on its being acted on just as it is now, I shall feel constrained to vote against it, and I think that there are other members on the floor who will also oppose it unless the feature of the bill to which I wish to call the attention or the House is remedied.

Under all of the revenue laws that we have had in operation up to this time no question has ever been put into the statute about the intent with which any violation of the law has been committed. The law has been like all of our revenue or taxation laws; it has required certain things to be done, and has provided that a failure to do those certain things shall be a violation of the law, without regard to the intent with which the things have been done.

Now, this section of the statutes which it is proposed to amend has, since the internal-revenue laws were first enacted, remained on the statute books unchanged as it rests there to-day. It provides as follows:

SEC. 3449. Whenever any person ships, transports, or removes any spirituous or fermented liquors or wines under any other than the proper name or brand known to the trade as designating the kind and quality of the contents of the casks or packages containing the same, or causes such acts to be done, he shall forfeit said liquors or wines, and casks or packages, and be subject to pay a fine of $500.

Now, so the law has stood since 1868, and anyone who sells, ships, transports, or disposes of liquors of any kind under a false name or of a kind or quality not designated upon the package shall be held to have violated the law. This bill comes in to amend that section; a section that has stood for twenty years—yes, more, for twenty-five years—and provides by adding a few words at the beginning of the section that—

Whenever any person knowingly sells or keeps on hand for sale—

Then follows the rest of the section just as it has always stood. Now, that is the secret of this whole thing, in the few words that have been added at the beginning of the section, namely: "Anyone who knowingly sells, ships, transports," or does any of the things that have always been prohibited. In other words, it changes the law and the whole spirit of the law. It makes this section an exception to all the sections of the internal-revenue laws, and requires the Government, before it can convict a man who evades the statute, to prove that he knew that the article he was selling was falsely branded.

Now, gentlemen can see what opportunity the Government would have to convict these men who are selling the three-star Hennessey brandy that my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] spoke of. This brandy is put up not by the distiller or by men honestly pursuing their business, but by men who are engaged in a fraudulent business. They compound it, they bottle it, they seal it up. They then have it on sale for retailers at a cheaper price than the genuine article would be. The retailers buy it because the bottle with its brand and labels looks like the genuine Hennessey brandy; but the retailer knows that he bought it at much less. He, however, has never sampled it. He does not know what is in the bottle. He buys it as his purchaser buys it, takes it on trust because of the label. Now, if that word "knowingly" is stricken out, then there can be no objection to this bill. The law always has extended simply to those who shipped and transported this fraudulent class of goods. This bill proposes to extend that law to those who sell and deal in that fraudulent kind of goods. That is all right. But when you add that word "knowingly," then you furnish a loophole by which the fraudulent seller, the fraudulent shipper, the fraudulent transporter can escape. Under the law as it has always stood the shipper and transporter never can escape, for if the article is traced to him the mere proof of the fact that it is fraudulent convicts him. Therefore it puts him on his guard. As the law stands to-day, every man who handles these fraudulent goods does so at his peril, if he is detected in handling or shipping them. Everybody does it at his peril except the man who sells. The law does not extend to the man who sells. This bill will extend it to the man who sells. Now, if you strike out the word "knowingly" then you make it possible for the Government to convict the very class of men who deal in the class of goods of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] spoke.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly, sir.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I agree with the gentleman perfectly; and those members of the committee whom I have seen are willing that the amendment inserting the word "knowingly" may be withdrawn.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Then do I understand that the word "knowingly" may be stricken out?

Mr. EVANS. We will state the proposition.

Mr. CONNOLLY. If that is done I shall have no objection.

Mr. EVANS. I will say to the House, Mr. Speaker, that there was considerable discussion in the committee upon the subject of this word "knowingly." It did not escape the attention of the committee, and in that discussion much doubt was expressed as to whether the word ought to be included in the bill. The criticisms of my distinguished friend from Illinois, as we all know, have force, not only in themselves, but because of his large experience in these matters. And so much are we impressed by them now—as we were before—that I have been instructed by the committee to withdraw their suggestion of this amendment, which was the only amendment offered to the bill. That being the only objection of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], we shall be very glad to have his support of the measure.

Mr. GRAFF. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CRISP. Have the committee instructed the gentleman to withdraw the word?

Mr. EVANS. I will not say that the committee formally did it, but in a conference among us, as far as the members could be found, it was agreed to withdraw it. I thought the gentleman from Georgia had been consulted.

Mr. CRISP. I am very much opposed to withdrawing the word. I do not think that any man ought to be convicted of any crime unless he has knowledge that he is committing it. I object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. EVANS. Then the committee can not do it, I suppose, as a committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to join the gentleman from Georgia in that. I am unwilling to make any man guilty of a crime by any act which of itself is an innocent act at the time he commits it.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman from Georgia, if I understand, objects to the withdrawal of the committee amendment?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Then it will have to be voted upon.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, as the law stands now it provides that any person who ships, transports, or removes any spirituous or fermented liquors or wines under a false brand shall forfeit them and be subject to a penalty. The proposition pending is to extend this provision not only to the person who ships or transports the goods, but to any person who sells or keeps on hand for sale any liquors under any false brand, and he is not only to be subject to forfeiture of the liquors, but subject to fine and imprisonment. The committee recommended extending the penalty to the seller of the liquor, provided there shall be incorporated in the law the word "knowingly," so that no man shall be punished for selling liquor under a false brand unless he knows at the time he sells it that he is selling it under a false brand. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], who is a lawyer of distinction, opposes this proposition. I thought it was an elementary principle of the law that there could be no conviction for crime unless in its commission there was a joint operation of act and intention.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is the rule concerning crimes that are crimes per se.

Mr. CRISP. That is true, or ought to be true, in every case.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It has never been true under the internal-revenue law.

Mr. CRISP. Let the gentleman for one moment look a little to the rights and liberties of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CRISP. I hope the gentleman will allow me to finish my remarks. Let the gentleman for one moment consider the public as well as the revenue. Pass this bill without the amendment recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, and what is the effect? A merchant doing business orders from a manufacturer or from a wholesale dealer liquors in bottles. He orders the the kind of brandy mentioned by my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]. He pays full price for the brandy that he orders. He honestly and bona fide believes that he is getting the very best merchandise, that which he ordered. It is corked and sealed. A purchaser buys from him a bottle of this brandy. If you do not incorporate in this statute the word "knowingly," then if in fact that brandy be as was that mentioned by my friend from New York, not only is it forfeited to the United States, but the merchant, the innocent seller, a man engaged in a lawful occupation, an honest man, who bought in the open market what he thought was honest goods, is to be fined and imprisoned; and this you call, in an enlightened age and country, a just and equitable law!

Mr. CONNOLLY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Has not the law since 1866 been such that a man who shipped, transported, or removed any such liquors, whether he knew it or not, could be convicted?

Mr. CRISP. It has.

Mr. CONNOLLY. It did not require any knowledge. Now, the purpose of this statute is to change that law, and to require that he can not be convicted without knowledge.

Mr. CRISP. The purpose of this statute, Mr. Speaker, is to extend that law. It not only applies to the shipper and the transporter but to the seller.

Mr. CONNOLLY. And to make it more difficult to convict the shipper as well as the seller.

Mr. CRISP. Why, undoubtedly, it ought to be difficult to convict an honest man.

Mr. CONNOLLY. But a dishonest man; how about him?

Mr. CRISP. Ah, Mr. Speaker, you must not, in framing your laws to reach the dishonest, leave out of consideration the honest man who is engaged in a lawful business.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Has it not been held in the courts since 1866, when a man was on trial relative to these internal-revenue laws, that he must knowingly have committed the violation?

Mr. CRISP. I am almost ashamed to say that I am not familiar with the decision.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The rule, if I correctly remember it, is that the court will charge that there must be knowledge. It is only in reference to adulterated foods that they hold that a man can be convicted without knowledge.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Illinois can give information better than I can on that question, as he has been engaged in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, but the idea I have is that when we extend this law so that it shall apply to every merchant who may sell liquors in bottles or in casks that he should not be punished by fine and imprisonment unless he knowingly sells them, and the onus ought to be on the Government to show that he did knowingly do it, because, Mr. Speaker, even in the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws we have not yet arrived, I hope, at that stage where the presumption of innocence does not attach to every man who is on trial for any offense.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time I have?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. EVANS. How much time do you want? I do not yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I just ask that the Clerk report the bill again, as there are no more copies to be had.

The bill was again read.

Mr. EVANS. If the gentleman from Georgia will remember, the original section 3449 does not include in it the word "knowingly"; and I believe I am correct in saying, having some familiarity with the subject, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] is correct in his statement that the word "knowingly" is not inserted in this connection in any internal-revenue law. The insertion of the word "knowingly" was recommended by the committee because it was supposed that it was possible that a person selling these goods might not at the time know what he was selling. But when we look at the subject more closely we will find that that could not long continue; that he could not engage long, at least, in the sale of these spurious and fraudulent brands of liquors without knowing exactly what he was doing. Now, I think that no poisonous or spurious compounds should be sent upon the markets with any sort of protection from the internal-revenue laws. The insertion of the word "knowingly" may possibly protect him to some extent, and it might be unwise to do so.

The internal-revenue laws never have heretofore contained the word, and while I originally favored the insertion of it, I have always felt the force of the objections to doing so. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue somewhat strongly opposed the proposition to amend the bill in this way, and in view of the criticisms made upon the amendment, I for one and those around me of the Ways and Means Committee agreed that the recommendation should be withdrawn. As objection is made to that, we can not withdraw it as a committee; but for my part, having perhaps suggested originally the insertion of the word "knowingly," I have no objection to the amendment being voted down.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if anyone else desires to ask any questions as to the bill I am ready to answer them if I can, or if any gentleman desires to make any suggestions I will give him time. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything to what has been so well said by my colleague [Mr. CONNOLLY]. The insertion of the word "knowingly" is an innovation in this kind of legislation by the Federal Congress, and it would be an innovation in legislation of this class in the State of Illinois. If the word "knowingly" is inserted in the statute, in my judgment the Government will be unable to enforce conviction in these cases, because it will be required to show not only the illegal traffic, but also knowledge on the part of the persons accused, and, judging from our experience in the enforcement of this kind of legislation in Illinois, that will be generally found impossible. I trust therefore that the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. GRAFF. Is it true that under this present bill there is no new duty imposed upon the distiller or the manufacturer of these liquors, so far as the branding of the liquors is concerned?

Mr. EVANS. None whatever. Now, Mr. Speaker, if no one else desires to be heard on the bill I will ask for the previous question.

Mr. HULICK. This bill is for the amendment of section 3449 of the Revised Statutes. In what respect is that section materially amended by the bill?

Mr. EVANS. The statute is amended by providing that, in addition to shipping, transporting, and removing these liquors, it shall be an offense to sell or keep them on hand for sale, or to keep them in bottles, casks, or packages, and that the bottles and other packages shall be forfeited. The punishment is also made more severe.

Mr. HOPKINS. The word "knowingly," in line 5, is a separate amendment, is it not?

Mr. EVANS. That is the amendment proposed by the committee, and it has been printed with the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is the amendment that I think ought to be voted down, and I shall ask for a separate vote upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the only amendment.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Let me ask the gentleman what has been the holding of our Federal courts on the law as it stands without the word "knowingly" in the statute?

Mr. HULICK. I do not think the Federal courts have ever held that it was necessary that the offense should be committed knowingly. They have taken that as a presumption arising from the fact of committing the offense.

Mr. HOPKINS. I can answer the gentleman so far as Illinois is concerned. In the Federal courts all that is required is to show simply the violation of the law under the language of the statute. That is all the Government is required to do in such cases.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is not the holding of the courts in Ohio.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, that is the rule in the Federal courts, and our State courts hold in conformity with the Federal courts.

Mr. HULICK. But would it be a good defense to show that the man charged did not know what the contents of the packages were?

Mr. HOPKINS. No; it would not.

Mr. HULICK. Then the mere possession of these unlawful goods would be prima facie evidence against the party.

Mr. EVANS. The possession of them for sale. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the committee amendments are two in number.

Mr. EVANS. Only one. Only the proposition to insert the word "knowingly" in the proposed bill.

Mr. HULICK. The bill itself is an amendment to the original statute. That is the "first" amendment referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, and now there is an amendment to the bill proposed by the committee, which is the "second" amendment.

The SPEAKER. The bill is a bill to amend the statute, and the committee have proposed an amendment, which is the "first" amendment. The previous question is ordered on the bill and the amendment to the passage.

Mr. OWENS. As I understand, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] has an amendment pending to strike out the word "knowingly."

The SPEAKER. No. The committee propose to insert that word as an amendment, and if it does not receive the approval of the House that will have the same effect as a vote to strike it out. The amendment is not in the bill until it is put there by the House.

Mr. OWENS. Before the previous question is ordered I want to suggest an amendment which I would like to offer.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. OWENS. Well, I ask unanimous consent to suggest this amendment. If the word "knowingly" be left in the bill, then I ask permission to move to strike out the words "knowingly sells or keeps on hand for sale." I think it much better to keep the law as it is, with only the punishment by imprisonment, than to put in this clause requiring the offense to be "knowingly" committed, because there is not a jury in the country that would not, in order to let an offender escape, find that he had not committed it "knowingly." So I would like to have an amendment pending to strike out the words "knowingly sells or keeps on hand for sale," so that in this respect the old law may be left intact, because I think that this word "knowingly," if ingrafted upon the old law, would render it nugatory and impossible of execution.

Mr. EVANS. We can accomplish the object the gentleman seeks by voting down the committee amendment which proposes to insert the word "knowingly."

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; let that be voted down.

The question being taken on the amendment of the committee, it was rejected, there being—ayes 25, noes 55.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Ways and Means any further business to present?

Mr. DINGLEY. We have no further business.

DISPOSITION OF MORMON CHURCH PROPERTY IN UTAH.

Mr. BRODERICK (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 96) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

The joint resolution was read, with the amendments of the committee, proposing to make it read as follows:

Whereas the corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints was dissolved by act of Congress of March 3, 1887; and

Whereas the real estate belonging to the said corporation at the time of its dissolution is now in the hands of a receiver appointed by the supreme court of the Territory of Utah; and

Whereas the said property is the result of contributions and donations made by the members of said church and was designed to be devoted to the payment of the debts of said church and to the charitable uses thereof, under the direction and control of the first presidency of the church; and

Whereas the said church has discontinued the practice of polygamy and does not encourage or give countenance in any manner to practices in violation of law; and if the said real estate is restored to said church it will not be devoted to any unlawful purpose: Therefore

Resolved, etc., That all of the real estate now in the hands of the receiver of the late corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints and all the rents, issues, and profits arising therefrom, which includes all the money held by him, be, and the same are hereby, restored to Wilford Woodruff, George Q. Cannon, and Joseph F. Smith, as trustees of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or their successors, to be devoted, under the direction and control of said trustees of said church, to the payment of the debts for which said church is legally or equitably liable, and to the charitable uses and purposes thereof; and the said receiver, after deducting the expenses of his receivership, under the direction of the supreme court of the State of Utah, or the court having charge of said receivership, is hereby required to deliver the said property and money to the persons constituting the trustees of said Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or to such person or persons as they may designate, to be held and applied to the payment of the debts of said church, as aforesaid, and to the charitable uses and purposes thereof.

Mr. HOPKINS. I trust that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] will give us some explanation of this bill.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, the history of this legislation may not be understood by all the members of the House. In 1862 the first act, known as the antipolygamy law, was passed. That law was not effectual. Under it, as will be remembered by those who kept watch of the proceedings at that time, there was much difficulty in securing convictions of those who violated the law. In 1887 that act was amended by the passage of what was known as the Edmunds-Tucker Act, which, among other provisions, restricted the property holdings of churches in the Territories. The Mormon Church in Utah was not pointed out in the act; yet it was understood at the time that the legislation was intended to apply more especially to that church, because of the large amount of property which it held, and because of the contest going on to have these people observe the law. Under the Edmunds-Tucker Act a proceeding was instituted in the Territorial supreme court and a receiver was appointed, who took charge of the property held by that church in excess of the $50,000 provided by the act. The receiver retained possession of all property in excess of $50,000, except the perishable property, until about a year ago.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS. Under what authority and for what purpose did the receiver take charge of this property, and what directions did he receive about maintaining it and about its ultimate disposition?

Mr. BRODERICK. He took possession of it under the act of Congress of 1887. The proceeds of the personal property, I think, were to go to the common schools of the Territory and the real property was to escheat to the General Government. There has been some controversy about it, but this is now settled. The receiver never disposed of any property except the personal property that was considered perishable. The last Congress passed a resolution similar in form to the one under consideration, providing that the receiver should return to the church the personal property. That resolution was passed by both Houses without a division, for the reason that it was understood that the Mormon people were no longer in opposition to the laws of the land.

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment, if the gentleman will yield. This legislation, as I understand, is designed to undo the legislation under which a receiver was appointed who took charge of the property; and the purpose now is that instead of having the personal property go to the common schools and the real estate to the General Government the property shall be taken out of the hands of the receiver and given back to the church.

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir; that will be the effect. About a year ago the personal property was all turned over and is now in the hands of the church. About that time, as gentlemen understand, Utah framed a constitution in which there was a strong inhibition against polygamy, and since that time has ratified the constitution, and laws have been enacted by the State in pursuance of that constitutional provision against polygamy. In view of these facts and of the further fact that it was understood and conceded by the Gentiles in that country that the Mormons had accepted the situation and were observing the law—that polygamy was no longer taught by the church, but was in fact discouraged—in view of these facts the last Congress provided for turning over the personal property, and it has been done. The real property and the rents and profits still remain in the hands of the receiver. Now, this resolution provides that this remaining property shall be returned to the church.

A resolution similar to this was introduced in the Senate and was passed there the other day without a division, the only difference being that in the Senate the preamble to the resolution was stricken out. Now I wish to have read the resolution as passed by the Senate, and then I shall move to substitute it for the House resolution as just read.

Mr. HOPKINS. In the judgment of the gentleman, would it not be wise to have this property turned over conditionally, the condition being that the church shall never go back to its polygamous practices or teachings, or if it does that the property shall then revert again to the General Government?

Mr. BRODERICK. They have already framed a constitution prohibiting polygamy, and have enacted laws upon the subject as strong as the laws of any State in the Union in further prohibition of it. It is conceded by all that they have given it up. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN] will explain that the people in his State all want this done. The Senators from that State were for this proposition, and the Senate passed a resolution which I send to the desk and ask to substitute for the House resolution. I refer now to the resolution S. R. 75, and I desire to offer it as a substitute for the House resolution in the shape that it passed the Senate. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all of the real estate now in the hands of the receiver of the late corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and all the rents, issues, and profits arising therefrom, which includes all the money held by him, be, and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, the expenses of the receivership to be allowed by the supreme court of the State of Utah being first paid, and said receiver, after the payment of said expenses, is hereby required to deliver the said property and money to the person or persons constituting the first presidency of said Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, or to such person or persons as he or they may designate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARRETT in the chair). Does the gentleman propose to substitute the wording of the Senate resolution for the House resolution?

Mr. BRODERICK. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman wishes to substitute the Senate resolution literally for the House resolution?

Mr. BRODERICK. That is what I propose, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the gentleman from Kansas the copy, the engrossed joint resolution as it came from the Senate?

Mr. BRODERICK. The Clerk has just read a copy of that resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is trying to explain that there is a difference between the two things. Does the gentleman wish to substitute the words employed by the Senate resolution or the Senate resolution itself?

Mr. BRODERICK. I wish to substitute the Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then, if so, it will be necessary to have the Senate resolution before the House—the engrossed copy.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then I desire to call up the Senate resolution and substitute it for that presented by the House committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the Senate resolution in possession of the House or in possession of the committee?

Mr. BRODERICK. I think in possession of the House, although it may have been referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If it is in the possession of the committee the gentleman will understand that it is not in possession of the House to substitute.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate resolution, and that it be offered as a substitute for the pending House resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRODERICK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say, as I have but a few minutes of the hour remaining, that the resolution passed the Senate without a division, and the House resolution was unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House.

I yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN], who desires to be heard.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I would ask for a vote upon the proposition without further discussion unless some gentleman wishes to ask a question, as I see our hour has about expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Utah this question: What is the value of the property?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. It is estimated by the receiver at $287,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. And consists of real estate mainly?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Of real estate, except $12,054.75 in money, which has accrued from the rents of the real estate.

Mr. DINGLEY. Under the act of 1887, unless this provision is made, this property would escheat to the United States or has already escheated?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Yes, sir; but it is still in the courts, in the hands of a receiver.

Mr. HULICK. What is the amount of the indebtedness that is asserted against the property?

Mr. BRODERICK. I can not answer that question.

Mr. HULICK. Well, is there a considerable sum that will remain after the payment of any indebtedness?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. There is no indebtedness except the expense of the receivership, which can not amount to a very considerable sum. This exception relates only to the expenses which have not been paid up to this time.

Mr. DINGLEY. And those expenses are to be deducted?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULICK. Then the entire proceeds would revert to the church if this resolution is adopted?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Yes, sir.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the substitution of the Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he has sent for a copy of the engrossed joint resolution as it came from the Senate.

Mr. STEELE. While waiting for the resolution I would like to ask the gentleman from Utah if there is any danger, after passing this resolution, that Utah will not want to change her constitution in so far as it relates to this subject?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I do not understand how much time we have, Mr. Speaker, but I am willing to answer these questions, and would like very much to have an opportunity to explain the matter at length.

Mr. STEELE. Well, then, suppose you proceed until the bill comes and give us your opinion of the matter, whether they are really sincere in this thing or not, or what the prospects are?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. The people of Utah have done all they could to assure the people of the United States of their sincerity in this respect. They abandoned the practice of polygamy as far back as 1890, and by what I think was the strongest possible assertion of their purpose, namely, a manifesto, coming through the head of their church, declared their purpose no longer to practice this tenet of their faith. No polygamous marriages have been solemnized by the church for more than five and a half years. The church has issued no permit for polygamous marriages since October, 1890.

The constitution which has been adopted by the State of Utah not only followed the wording of the enabling actupon this point, which wording is as follows:

Polygamous or plural marriages are forever prohibited.

But they also provided in the constitution that an act which had been passed in 1892 by the legislature of the then Territory should remain in force and effect after the admission of the State to the Union, which act provided for the punishment of polygamy. I quote from the constitution now in force in the State of Utah, on page 43, section 2:

The act of the governor and legislative assembly of the Territory of Utah entitled "An act to punish polygamy and other kindred offenses," approved February 4, A. D. 1882, in so far as the same defines and imposes penalties for polygamy, is hereby declared to be in force in the State of Utah.

In response to the question of my friend, who wishes to know whether the constitution of the State will be changed wherein it relates to polygamy, I will say: It is true that the Mormon people resisted the enforcement of the antipolygamy laws so long as they had a standing in the courts for their contention; but when the final decisions of the courts had been had, and this people found themselves adjudged wrong upon every essential point in controversy, they accepted the situation and declared they would abide by the law of the nation. By their every public act, by their acts as a church, and, as I believe, by their purpose as private individuals, they have shown and they now indicate their purpose to abide by the sentiment and law of the American people.

The history of Utah during the past six years indicates to my mind that there can be no such change in its fundamental law. This step has been taken deliberately by its people, and they will stand by the promises and pledges made to the nation. They are an honest people.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. Are we to understand from the statement of the gentleman that the church received a revelation that they must abandon polygamy, and therefore have abandoned it?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. In October, 1890, there was issued by the first presidency of the Mormon Church what is commonly known in that church and in Utah as the "Manifesto," wherein it was stated that polygamy should no longer be practiced by the Mormon Church.

Mr. HULICK. Well, has that practice ceased because of the revelation or because of the constitutional and legal prohibition? Suppose a revelation were to come from the church hereafter that polygamy should again be adopted, would they observe the law as it is, or would they observe the revelation, and thereby claim that that is the higher power binding them, and the property be subject thereto?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I can not in the few minutes that I have go over all the details of the subject opened by this question. If the gentleman had lived there for fifteen years, as I have, and had been all through this fight——

Mr. HULICK. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah (continuing). And had been all through this fight in opposition to the church in its practice of polygamy, and one of the last who gave up that fight, I think he would feel, as I do, that the assurances that have been made by the people of Utah are sufficient and that the promise of the present will be sacredly observed in the future.

Mr. STEELE. I understand that the Republican legislature of Utah has passed a resolution requesting this legislation.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Yes; and it was in the platform of the party, showing that the people of Utah, both Gentiles and Mormons, are in favor of it.

Mr. STEELE. The engrossed resolution is here now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the engrossed joint resolution of the Senate is now in the hands of the Clerk, and if there is no objection, the pending joint resolution will be considered as laid upon the table. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN] moves to take up the Senate joint resolution providing for the disposition of certain property in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RIGHT OF APPEAL IN RECEIVERSHIP CASES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the Committee on the Judiciary any other bill to call up at this time?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask for the present consideration, during the morning hour, of the bill (H. R. 4554) to amend the act approved February 18, 1895, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," approved February 18, 1895, designated in Supplement to Revised Statutes, volume 2, No. 5, as chapter 96, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That the seventh section of the act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, be amended so as to read as follows:

"'That where, upon a hearing in equity in a district or circuit court, an injunction shall be granted, continued, refused, or dissolved, or a receiver appointed or refused by an interlocutory order or decree, or an application to dissolve an injunction shall be refused, in a case in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting, continuing, refusing, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve an injunction, or appointing or refusing such receiver, to the circuit court of appeals: Provided, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from the entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court; and the proceedings in other respects in the court below shall not be stayed, unless otherwise ordered by that court, during the pendency of such appeal: And provided further, That pending the appeal the court may make such orders respecting the property in the custody of the court as the court may deem proper or necessary': And provided further, That the court below may, in its discretion, require as a condition of the appeal an additional injunction or other bond."

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Speaker, this is a committee substitute for the bill H. R. 218. Its effect is to give the right of appeal from an order of the court appointing or refusing to appoint a receiver. I do not care to say anything more myself on the bill, and I yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], who introduced the original bill.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] has just stated is, I think, a sufficient summary of the parliamentary history of the bill. It is really a substitute for a bill which I had the honor to introduce. The substitute is slightly different from the bill which I introduced, but I have accepted the substitute which the Judiciary Committee prepared, and which was necessarily different from the one that I introduced, because in drafting my bill I overlooked the fact that the law which I sought to amend had been previously amended. The substitute conforms to that state of things and adds a provision or two to which I can not object. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] has sufficiently indicated the purpose of the bill. The original act creating a circuit court of appeals allowed an appeal from the district or circuit court, from interlocutory orders granting or refusing or continuing injunctions, but it did not provide for appeals from orders appointing or refusing to appoint receivers. A general demand has grown up to allow appeals in these latter cases as well as in the former, and certainly no objection can be suggested against it. I will not detain the House longer, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that the bill will pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. As the morning hour has expired, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have the second hour to which they will be entitled to-morrow at this time. That will enable them to go on with their business to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be allowed an additional hour at this time instead of to-morrow for the consideration of their bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES RAILROAD CORPORATIONS.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to present to the House the bill which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 325) to provide that United States railroad corporations shall, for purposes of jurisdiction, be deemed citizens of the respective States into which their line of railway may extend.

Be it enacted, etc., That all United States railroad corporations or railroad corporations or companies organized or incorporated under or by virtue of any law or laws of the United States shall, for all purposes of jurisdiction, be held and deemed to be citizens and corporations of the respective States into which their line of railway or any branch or spur thereof may extend or in which any such corporation may conduct or carry on any business; and service of process upon such corporations may be made according to the laws of the respective States in which suit shall be brought.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage, and all acts or parts thereof in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to occupy any considerable time of the House. I think the reading of the bill will commend itself at once to the judgment of all the members of the House. It simply makes Federal railroad corporations citizens of the several States in which they do business. It subjects them to the same conditions that all individuals are subjected to, citizens of the State, and subject to the laws of the State in which they do business. I do not care to say any more, and yield now to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], the original introducer of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, unless some one desires an explanation in regard to this bill, I do not think it really necessary to take up the time of the House with it. It has been unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and was thoroughly considered by that committee. The bill has passed this House once before by a two-thirds majority, and unless there is some objection, or some gentleman desires information, I will not detain the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I desire to correct the statement of the gentleman that it was unanimously reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. It was not. I am a member of that committee, and never voted for the bill.

Mr. TERRY. I will state to the gentleman that I so understand it. If the gentleman objected, I did not know it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I did not and do not approve of the bill. That bill makes a distinction between the ordinary citizen and a railroad corporation. The ordinary citizen is not subject to be dealt with in the courts of the State in which he does business, but is subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the State in which he resides. If he resides in one State and does business in another, and a suit is brought against him in a State court in the State in which he does business, he has the right, under the Federal statutes, to remove his case to the Federal court for trial. That right has always been secured to the citizen. This bill now seeks to change that rule, that has obtained since the organization of the Government—a rule both as to the human being, the citizen, and the corporation. For that reason, making that distinction, I would not approve the bill. I do not approve it now and did not approve it in committee. I was not present, I believe, at the time when a vote was taken on ordering the bill reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

That is my objection to the bill. It makes fish of one and flesh of another. It is simply an attempt to subject every railroad corporation in the United States to the jurisdiction of the State courts of the States through which the road runs, and to force them, without relief or remedy, to try their causes in the courts of the State through which they run. Now, gentlemen may say, Is not that right? Well, men differ in their views about that, as to whether it is right or not. If it is right to the railroad corporation it should be held equally right as to the citizen; so that if a citizen of New York is found in the State of Arkansas and suit brought against him, he is forced to submit his cause to trial in the State courts of Arkansas. It has always been the rule that a citizen of Arkansas, if found in New York and suit brought against him, had the right to transfer it to the Federal courts, or, vice versa, if a citizen of New York should be found in the State of Arkansas and suit brought against him, the Federal court was open to him. These provisions have existed from the foundation of the Government, to remove the citizen from the local prejudices that may be supposed to exist; and I see no reason now, after a century of existence, why we should change that rule as to one class of citizens unless we change it as to all.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out the words "United States railroad corporations, or."
In line 4 strike out the words "or companies."

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, the objections just urged by my friend on the Judiciary Committee are more imaginary than real. The difference existing between the case of an ordinary citizen of the United States, an individual, and one of these United States railroad corporations is inherent in the nature of things, and the vast difference in the operations and business of these corporations compared with the business of the individual citizen——

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. TERRY. Certainly.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I see the feature of the bill to which I was objecting has been stricken out, and this bill now only applies, as I understand it, to lines organized under acts of Congress?

Mr. TERRY. That is right, sir.

Mr. CONNOLLY. To that I have no objection.

Mr. TERRY. I did not think that a gentleman of his ability as a lawyer would object to this if he understood it.

Mr. DINGLEY. These roads are practically only the Pacific railroads, are they not?

Mr. TERRY. The Northern Pacific and the Texas Pacific, and one or two other United States roads. There may be some others, but it applies simply to those chartered under statutes of the United States.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMISSIONS OF DEPARTMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I call up the bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the commissions of all officers under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall be made out and recorded in the respective Departments under which they are to serve, and the Department seal affixed thereto, any laws to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That the said seal shall not be affixed to any such commission before the same shall have been signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, the report fully states the reasons for the passage of this bill and I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments, submit the following report:

As early as January, 1785, Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, by "an ordinance for ascertaining the powers and duties of the Secretary of War," defined them with great particularity, and among other duties directed him "to make out, seal, and countersign the commissions of all such military officers as shall be employed in the service of the United States." Those duties were generally devolved, under the Constitution, upon the Secretary of War by the act of August 7, 1789 (1 Stat. L., 49), and he continued to discharge them, both as to the land and naval forces, until by the act of April 30, 1798 (1 Stat. L., 553), the Department of the Navy was established, and the Secretary of the Navy was required to assume control of all matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States. By the act of September 15, 1789 (1 Stat. L., 68), the Secretary of State was required to make out, record, and affix the seal of the United States to all civil commissions issued by the Government.

Thus the law remained until by the act of March 18, 1874 (18 Stat. L., 23), the Postmaster-General was directed to make out and record all the commissions of postmasters appointed by the President and to affix the seal of his Department thereto.

The next year it was provided by the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L., 420), that the commissions of the officers of the Interior Department should be made out, recorded, and sealed in that Department, and by the act of August 8, 1888 (25 Stat. L., 387), the Attorney-General was required to countersign all the commissions of judicial officers, including marshals and United States attorneys, and to have them prepared and recorded in the Department of Justice.

These several changes from the early statute of 1789 have been found satisfactory in their practical operations, and it is now deemed advisable by your committee that each Executive Department make out and record the commissions of its own officers. This bill is earnestly recommended by the Secretary of State.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make the practice throughout all the Departments uniform. It is approved by the Secretary of State, and, so far as the committee is advised, there is no objection to it upon the part of anybody. I ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OVER PLACES CEDED TO UNITED STATES.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 6345) to establish a criminal jurisdiction over places ceded to the United States for certain purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when any offense is committed in any place jurisdiction over which has been retained by the United States or ceded to it by a State, or which has been purchased with the consent of a State for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building, the punishment for which offense is not provided for by any law of the United States, the person committing such offense shall, upon conviction in a circuit or district court of the United States for the district in which the offense was committed, be liable to and receive the same punishment as the laws of the State in which such place is situated now provide for the like offense when committed within the jurisdiction of such State, and the said courts are hereby vested with jurisdiction for such purpose; and no subsequent repeal of any such State law shall affect any such prosecution.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been unanimously reported by the committee. It is accompanied by a report which fully explains its object, but that report is long, and I think that in a word I can satisfy the House of the intention of the bill and the wisdom of its passage. It is practically a reenactment of a law which provides for the same purpose. The reason it becomes necessary to pass this bill is that the old law has in it the word "now," providing that "all criminal laws now in force" in the State shall be in force in the United States territory within that State. The statute was passed in 1866, so that the only criminal laws which are in force now in such places are those that were in force in 1866. Since that time several new States have come into the Union, and inasmuch as there were no State laws in those States in 1866, there are now no criminal State laws which apply to places ceded to the United States within their limits. Therefore, it is necessary to pass this bill reenacting that old law and providing that all laws which are now in force in the States shall also be in force in these places of United States jurisdiction within the States. That is the whole purpose of the bill, and unless there is objection I move that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SHOOTING AT RAILWAY TRAINS.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill H. R. 5379, which is reported by the committee as a substitute for House bill No. 1237.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who, in the Indian Territory, shall willfully and maliciously shoot at or into any locomotive, caboose, postal car, passenger coach, express or baggage car of any railway train, or at any person thereon, or shall throw any rock or other missile at or into any locomotive, caboose, postal car, passenger coach, express or baggage car of any railway train, or at any person thereon, or shall derail or attempt to derail any locomotive or train, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary for any time not more than twenty years: Provided, That if any person shall be killed, either directly or indirectly, by reason of said shooting, throwing, or derailing, the person causing the death shall be deemed guilty of murder, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished accordingly.

SEC. 2. That any person who, in the Indian Territory, shall willfully shoot at or into any freight, stock, postal, baggage, or other car of any railway train, whether such car is attached to a locomotive or not, or shall throw a stone or any other missile at or into such car, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ninety days or by fine not exceeding $300, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The original bill (H. R. 1237) was laid on the table; and on motion of Mr. BRODERICK, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

REPORTER OF COURT OF APPEALS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration, and in the House as in Committee of the Whole, of the bill (H. R. 4797) to provide compensation to the reporter of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, what will become of our morning hour if this request be granted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the expiration of the morning hour the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asked consent that the Committee on the Judiciary should have an extra hour to-day, to come out of its time to-morrow. No objection was made, and the second hour awarded to that committee is now in progress.

Mr. LOUD. But I mean beyond that—after that hour has expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the expiration of the morning hour, which has been extended for one hour by the consent of the House, the call of committees will continue unless the question is raised——

Mr. LOUD (interposing). The Chair evidently does not understand my question. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] now rises and asks a unanimous consent, which is outside of that hour entirely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary having been allowed an additional hour for the consideration of measures reported by it, the Chair has recognized a member of the committee [Mr. BAKER] to ask for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. LOUD. Within the rules, Mr. Speaker, but not outside of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not. The gentleman from New Hampshire has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill. If that consent is not granted, and it will not be if anyone objects, the Chair will not entertain the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. LOUD. But before the question of giving consent is put I wish to know what will be the result of granting unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will certainly not take us beyond the morning hour.

Mr. LOUD. I ask the judgment of the Chair in the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will please state his question again.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to know what would be the result of granting this unanimous consent. Will it determine the hour? It evidently breaks into the hour by another order of business, and I simply ask a ruling of the Chair as to where it will leave us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course only bills on the House Calendar can be considered in this consideration hour, and I suppose what the gentleman from New Hampshire asks is that a bill which is not on the House Calendar may be considered during this hour, and may also be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, as it contains an appropriation. Of course this proposition, if agreed to, would be a variation of the rule, but nevertheless I suppose anything can be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER (having resumed the chair). The Chair thinks it has not been the custom under the present system of rules to allow proceedings by unanimous consent during the consideration hour.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then the bill is withdrawn.

TYPEWRITING IN TAKING DEPOSITIONS.

Mr. TERRY. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call up the bill (H. R. 2178) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to taking depositions de bene esse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 864. Every person deposing as provided in the preceding section shall be cautioned and sworn to testify the whole truth and carefully examined.

"His testimony shall be reduced to writing or typewriting by the magistrate or under his personal supervision, or by himself in the magistrate's presence, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing or typewriting, be subscribed by the deponent."

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been unanimously reported from the Judiciary Committee. Its whole scope and purpose is simply to provide that depositions taken upon a typewriting machine shall be legal, just the same as if taken in longhand writing. That is all there is in the bill. It simply amends the present law by inserting after the word "writing" the words "or typewriting."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do not the decisions of the courts already sustain the proposition that if an instrument is written upon the typewriting machine it has the same legal effect as if written in longhand?

Mr. TERRY. That might be true if it were typewritten by the magistrate himself; but the statute now provides as follows:

His testimony—

That is, the testimony of the witness—

shall be reduced to writing by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by himself [the witness] in the magistrate's presence, and by no other person.

Under that provision of the statute, the deposition must be reduced to writing by the magistrate himself, or by the person giving the deposition; but under this bill if the magistrate has, acting under his direction, an operator on the typewriting machine, that operator can record in that way the deposition, and by this bill it is made legal. It has, in fact, been thus done time and again, and I do not know that any objection has ever been raised; but the purpose of the bill is to obviate the possibility of a deposition so taken being held illegal.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. The object, then, as I understand, is that the deposition may be recorded by a person using the typewriting machine under the direction of the magistrate.

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULICK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. Suppose we wish to have the deposition of a witness taken down by a stenographer. Would that be objectionable under the amendatory bill now proposed? Must it be written upon the typewriting machine by the magistrate himself or by some person under his supervision?

Mr. TERRY. The usual practice in my part of the country is that when we want to have a stenographer take down depositions the attorneys agree that the depositions may be taken down in that way and transcribed.

Mr. HULICK. Would it not be well to consider the advisability of incorporating in the bill a provision that these depositions may be taken down by a stenographer and then certified by the magistrate? We find it very convenient to employ stenographers; but where their employment depends upon the agreement of the attorneys, the attorneys may sometimes, like other human beings, fail to come to an agreement.

Mr. TERRY. I appreciate the value of the gentleman's suggestion; and if there has been any inconvenience in that respect in his part of the country he should present a bill on the subject. We can not undertake to cover all these things in this single bill, which was designed for a single purpose.

Mr. HULICK. We have found practical inconvenience sometimes for want of such a provision as I have suggested.

Mr. TERRY. I have no doubt that the subject is a proper one for legislation, but we are now providing only for what the committee has fully considered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Of course I am in favor of any change which may be necessary to make our laws conform to the present methods of doing business. So far as I have heard, one court only has decided that a typewritten deposition was not a compliance with the United States statutes. I differed with that learned judge, though I had no interest in the case. I did not believe the language of the law was capable of such a misconstruction.

As to the question suggested by my colleague [Mr. HULICK], I think that when a deposition is taken by a stenographer, written out, read over to the witness, signed by him, and certified by the notary public or other officer taking the deposition, the law is fully complied with. Hence I think that the amendment contemplated by this bill will furnish all the legislation necessary on this subject.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary has no further bills to submit at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the other committees.

When the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called,

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that committee be passed over without prejudice, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is not present. He desires to present some matters for consideration.

There was no objection.

Mr. McRAE. I ask the same for the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. However, I see the chairman of the committee is now present.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee be passed over for the present without losing its privilege.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GROUT (when the Committee on Agriculture was called). Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is not present, and I ask unanimous consent that the committee be passed over without prejudice, as there are some matters he desires to call to the attention of the House.

There was no objection.

The Committee on Military Affairs was called.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS, ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army or Navy of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, which section is as follows: "No person who held a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States at the beginning of the late rebellion, and afterwards served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army or Navy of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before that, Mr. Speaker, I would like some explanations of this bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, this is simply an act to repeal the law which prohibits the appointment in the Army or Navy of men who, holding commissions in the United States Army, resigned and served in the Confederate army. It passed the Senate some days ago, and is about the last of the restrictions left on the men who engaged in the rebellion. The objection raised by some is that it gives a preference over the Union soldiers in such appointments.

This, as a matter of fact, is not by any means true. It simply gives the same right to fight for the flag to the Confederate soldier that the Union soldier has under our existing law. And so far as the appointments in the Regular Army or Navy are concerned, these men are all past the age which would entitle them to such appointments, unless Congress should pass a special act in their behalf.

Mr. LACEY. What is the lowest age at which a man can be appointed an officer in the Regular Army now?

Mr. HULL. There is no barrier——

Mr. LACEY (continuing). I mean would it not be limited by the retiring age anyhow?

Mr. HULL. Of course; but there is no vacancy except such as shall be created by act of Congress or those that come through promotions where vacancies occur in the grade of second lieutenants, and these are filled by men who enter the Army as private soldiers and serve two years, pass the examination required by law, and receive their promotions to the office of second lieutenant.

So far as I am concerned I have no objection whatever, in case of another war, to allowing the men who fought in the Confederate army to enter the Union service, if they desire to do so, and get shot in place of myself.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that the gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. BOUTELLE], desired to be heard upon this bill, and as the committee has several other bills to be considered, I ask him to withdraw this until the gentleman from Maine can be present.

Mr. HULL. Well, I do not know when we can get the gentleman from Maine here. I told him that we would take advantage of the first opportunity when the committee was called to bring it forward for consideration.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the gentleman can withdraw this for the present and call up another bill.

Mr. HULICK. The gentleman from Maine is now engaged in perfecting the naval appropriation bill, which we expect to call up to-morrow morning for consideration, and I am satisfied that he can not now attend to this matter.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think it would be an act of courtesy on the part of the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw the bill temporarily.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to that, of course, in the absence of the gentleman from Maine, and will withdraw the bill until he can be sent for.

The SPEAKER. The bill is temporarily withdrawn.

MEDALS OF HONOR.

Mr. HULL. I now call up for present consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the act of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That any person who has been, or may hereafter be, awarded the medal of honor provided by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863, respectively, may wear, in lieu of said medal, a rosette or bowknot of ribbon, of a pattern and under regulations to be established by the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to determine and prescribe a suitable ribbon for the medal of honor in lieu of that heretofore provided.

SEC. 2. That the wearing of said medal or ribbon by any other than the persons above specified shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and subject, on conviction, to a penalty of $100.

Mr. HULL. This simply provides that the men who for gallant services have received medals of honor for the performance of distinguished services in the civil war may wear a rosette to be adopted by the order of the War Department——

Mr. STEELE. Prescribed by the President of the United States.

Mr. HULL. Yes, prescribed by the President—that will designate the fact that the wearer of the rosette is the possessor of one of these medals of honor. It is plain that the medal of honor, which is of iron, is unwieldy, very heavy, and it is very highly prized by the possessors and their families. They are liable to be lost if constantly worn, and for that reason parties having them ask permission to wear something in the nature of a badge, such as the rosette of the Loyal Legion, to indicate the ownership of one of these medals.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] is especially interested in this matter, he having a medal given to him on account of distinguished services as a Union soldier in the war of the rebellion. I regret that he is not present at this time. This, as I have said, is simply to authorize the wearing of a rosette to designate the fact that the wearer is the possessor of one of these medals.

Mr. HOPKINS. Can not they do that now without the passage of this act?

Mr. HULL. No; because if so, everybody could wear it without restriction. I ask a vote.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RETIREMENT OF ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 4575) to amend chapter 67, volume 23, of the Statutes at Large of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act approved September 30, 1890, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That when an enlisted man has served thirty years in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, he shall, by making application, be placed on the retired list with 75 per cent of his pay and allowances of the rank upon which he was retired, and $7.50 per month as commutation of quarters."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, this is new legislation. It increases the pay of enlisted men on the retired list by giving them 75 per cent of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which they were retired.

Mr. DINGLEY. This bill should not be on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This bill is not admissible under this order of business.

Mr. HULL. I think it is open to that objection, and I withdraw the bill and introduce another, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

BREVET APPOINTMENTS IN CERTAIN CASES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, presents the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers of the Regular Army of the United States, active or retired, who served in the volunteer forces during the late war, shall receive a brevet in the Regular Army equal to the highest brevet received in the said volunteer forces and be commissioned accordingly as of the date of such brevet: Provided, That they have not already received a brevet of equal or higher grade in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, this bill simply provides that men who fought in the volunteer service and were brevetted for distinguished services, and who afterwards served in the Regular Army, shall receive the brevet rank in the Regular Army that they earned by serving in the volunteer army. The bill gives no pay, and entails no additional expense to the Government in any way. It simply recognizes these men for their distinguished services during the war.

Mr. HOPKINS. Whom is this bill intended to affect?

Mr. HULL. It will affect about twenty-five or thirty men who are now in the Regular Army.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is an amendment to that bill, is there not?

Mr. HULL. I believe there is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 6, after the word "to," the words "the highest rank held or."

Mr. HULL. That amendment was put in so that if a man had a high rank in the volunteer service and was not brevetted he shall now get a brevet rank in the Regular Army equal to the highest rank which he held in the volunteer service. This is simply a concession in the nature of a complimentary commission without any expense whatever. I move that the amendment be adopted and that the bill do pass.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to hear that amendment read again.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS, ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I again call up the bill that was temporarily laid aside on account of the absence of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army or Navy of the United States, was again read as above set forth.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to again debate the bill. It is something that every member of the House is as competent to form an opinion upon as I am. It is simply to remove about the last restriction that remains on our statute books against the men who organized and fought the rebellion, and as we have them in Congress and in the Cabinet, and as they could be elected to the Presidency, I certainly have no objection to their entering the Army or Navy if the occasion requires their services, and to letting them take the same chances of war that the rest of us would take. It is a question that the House is just as competent to pass upon as the committee. The committee have unanimously recommended it, and it is before the House for its action.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to ask the gentleman what purpose is sought to be accomplished by the bill?

Mr. HULL. I think there is very little to be accomplished by it one way or the other.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then why are we to take up time to consider it, if there is nothing to be accomplished by it?

Mr. HULL. We did not expect it would take over ten minutes. It took probably five minutes in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why should it even take five, unless there is something to be accomplished by it?

Mr. HULL. The object, as I understand, is simply to remove the one restriction that now exists on the statute books against Confederates. It seems to me that the restriction is one that could be very properly removed at this time when we are hearing of wars and rumors of wars all over the world, and when there is a possibility that we may call upon our citizens to defend the flag and the integrity of the Government against foreign foes.

It seems to me it is simply fair to say that the men who tried for four years to destroy the Government may try for four years, if necessary, to preserve it. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to let them stand shoulder to shoulder with me and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] if we have another war, to show that they love the flag and are willing, if necessary, to die for it.

It gives them absolutely no advantage over any man who was a Union soldier. It simply places the Confederates side by side with the Union soldier in case we enter into a war. This idea that they are to be appointed in the Regular Army has no terrors whatever for me. If there is some man whom the President wants to appoint in the Regular Army, as has been suggested, he must go before the Senate and be confirmed; and I can conceive of no reason why any man who served in the Confederate army should now be appointed to the Regular Army. There would have to be a vacancy before he could be appointed outside of the staff corps. It is possible that a man might be appointed judge-advocate, or he might be appointed in some other staff corps; but to appoint him in the line of the Army would be impossible.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman has not heard of any protest from any Union soldier against this bill?

Mr. HULL. On the contrary, I have received letters from Union soldiers favoring the wiping out of this last restriction.

Mr. PICKLER. I think that is the feeling of the Union soldiers throughout this country.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I have no commission to appear for the Union soldier or anybody else but myself. I simply want a little information upon this subject. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if he has any information upon the matter, will inform me what is the object or what benefit to the people of the United States is to be accomplished by the passage of this bill. His rhetoric I admire; it is beautiful. His patriotism appeals to my sentiment, and it sounds nice; but he has very successfully up to this time evaded giving any reason why we should legislate upon this subject at all. Does he know a single officer who could be commissioned in the United States Army if this bill were passed?

Mr. HULL. No.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He does not. Then why do you want to pass the bill?

Mr. HULL. In the event of war we will call for troops. The Regular Army may be increased. It may be that they will be commissioned, and maybe they never will be commissioned. The bill has been put before us by the action of the Senate; and I will not put myself in the position of voting or speaking or working against it, because I can see no reason on earth for retaining this on the statute books of our country.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, the gentleman ought to be able to give some reason.

Mr. HULL. The very fact that it is there on the statute books standing against these men and against men who can make and execute our laws, who can be Supreme Court judges, is a discrimination against them that should not longer be perpetuated on the statute books in my judgment. It may be only a matter of sentiment, but when that sentiment can be gratified without injury to the country my vote shall be in favor of it. So long after the war I would not let this restriction remain to annoy anyone.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My friend says it is a discrimination against somebody on some privilege, and says we can not discriminate against them. Will the gentleman tell what privilege the bill would give?

Mr. HULL. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, I shall be perfectly frank and candid. I will say that this bill is brought up here for sentimental purposes.

Mr. HULL. Well, we will call it that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very good.

Mr. PICKLER. Sentiment is a good motive.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Perhaps there is no one who has a larger share than my friend. [Laughter.] I have seen my friend from South Dakota when I thought he was charged with sentiment from crown to sole. But let us see what the sentiment is. If there is anything involved in this bill, it is a proposition to undo something that was done many years ago. It is not a proposition capable of accomplishing any practical purpose to-day; and therefore the only possible object that I can see is to cast a reflection upon the sentiment of the people who enacted that law.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Wait a moment. At the time this law was passed there was good reason for it, was there not?

Mr. PICKLER. I think there was.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It represented a very proper sentiment.

Mr. PICKLER. I think it did.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Was there anybody north of Mason and Dixon's line or many south of Mason and Dixon's line who had any feeling that an officer who had been educated at the expense of the United States Government and bore its commission, and then saw fit, in the exercise of his personal volition, to go out and fight against the Government, should be kept eligible to a commission in the United States Army? I think not. Now, why should this Congress desire to enter upon retroactive legislation here that will suggest that there was a mistake in that legislation?

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman now allow me?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Wait a moment. If there is anybody here to-day or anywhere living in this country who is eligible to appointment in the United States Army and desires to go into the United States Army, or who has desired to be able to be put into the United States Army, why not act upon it? Why go back? You may just as well go back and repeal Abraham Lincoln's proclamation for 75,000 troops. You may just as well go back and expunge any chapter of the war's history as to do this. You can not do it. We can not wipe out the fact that we had war. We can not ignore the fact that people were arrayed against the Government of the United States and that the Government resorted to extraordinary measures to save the life of the nation, and I can see in this bill only another ebullition of what seems to me the everlasting desire to bring up the issues of the war.

Why not let them rest? More railing accusation has been made in this House against people who stir up the embers of civil strife than has been uttered upon any other subject here. Now we have brought up here a measure tending in that direction, a measure that is not going to do anybody any good. All around me are men who served in the Union Army and in the Union Navy, but nobody gets up here and proposes to make them eligible to commissions in the United States Army or the United States Navy. We are not eligible. The regulations provide who shall hold the commissions.

Mr. HULL. Let me ask the gentleman whether this bill will give the persons to whom it applies any rights of that kind more than the Union soldiers have?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Ought they to have any more?

Mr. HULL. No; but you are arguing as if this bill did give them more.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is a most peculiar argument of the gentleman from Iowa. Does he think that these men ought to have any more rights than the Union soldiers?

Mr. HULL. I do not think anything of the kind; but you have been arguing as if you thought this bill would give them more. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been holding the floor with the hope of winding this matter up within an hour.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not think you are holding the floor against me.

Mr. HULL. Yes; I am holding the floor, and I shall move the previous question before I sit down.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I reminded the gentleman from Iowa that I proposed to exercise my right to try to be heard, and he took pains to send to the other end of this Capitol to enable me to be heard; but now it seems he does not want to hear me.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, is this discussion in my time or in the gentleman's own time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that it was in the gentleman's own time, though the matter was quite informal.

Mr. HULL. Then, if the gentleman is proceeding in his own time, I will simply reserve mine.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to another consideration. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has challenged those of us who propose to vote in favor of this bill to give our reason. That goes to the country, and it is a pretty important suggestion coming from the gentleman from Maine, and for one I should like very much to state briefly the reasons why I am in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. HULL. As the gentleman from Maine is not exhausting my time, there will be ample opportunity for other gentlemen to be heard.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think so, as there is only an hour altogether.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, we can take another day. This matter had better be discussed fully on both sides.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Have I the floor, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I had no idea that this bill was coming up to-day. It is a very busy day with me for many reasons, and I did not expect to devote any of it to this bill. I do not regard this as a measure of special urgency. We have had a number of these bills, but to my mind this has the least excuse of any that has ever been brought in here. You might just as well bring up a bill to repeal some law that regulated the qualifications of officers entering the Continental Army a century ago. There is not a man in the House of Representatives to-day who has any expectation, probably none who has any desire, to be commissioned in the United States Army. There is no necessity for any such legislation as this, and the only possible effect it can have is to cast some sort of reflective shadow upon the sentiment involved in the original passage of that act.

I believe that act was right. I do not believe it would have been possible to save the life of this nation on any other principle than the principle involved in that act. I do not believe there was any injustice in passing it. I believe that if it is possible for the human mind to conceive a case in which a man would render himself ineligible to a commission in the Army or the Navy of the United States it would be the case of a man who, having been educated at the expense of the Government or, whether so educated or not, held a commission in the Army or the Navy of the United States, and then, without coercion, deliberately elected to turn his weapons against the Government.

Now, if you want to pass a vote here which will qualify that sentiment, if you want in 1896 to resolve that in the opinion of Congress a man who holds a commission to-day in the Army of the United States, or any of the boys at the Naval Academy or at West Point who may come hereafter to hold commissions in the United States Army or Navy, may go out and enter upon rebellion against the Government and then come back and be regarded as eligible to again wear the uniform and again receive the commission of the Government of the United States, of course you gentlemen can do it. I could conceive that there might be some exigency which would strain men's purposes very much in the direction of leniency, perhaps even to the extent of enacting legislation of this kind, but there is nothing to-day which warrants any such extraordinary action; there is nothing calling for this legislation, and I simply ask gentlemen to consider what they are invited to do. Now, there are members here who no doubt sincerely believe that they are very much more friendly to our brethren who engaged in the rebellion than I am, but I doubt it.

There is no man in the United States, without regard to his previous condition, without regard to his former relations to the war which lasted four years and more—there is no man who is obeying the laws, who is a good citizen, who is laboring to promote the interests of our common country, for whom I have not the kindest feeling; and there is no such man with whom I will not cooperate in securing any possible benefit for the country or for his constituents. I can say that on a record of thirteen years in this House. But I claim that it is my right and my duty when a mere sentimental proposition like this is brought up, the only possible sentiment or suggestion of which is to obliterate the sacredness of the obligation that a man owes to his flag and his country—it is my right and my duty to say that we ought to hesitate about such a measure.

I do not think we ought to adopt it unless some great, overriding necessity compels us to do so. There is no man kept out of the United States Army to-day by reason of that law—not one. And when the gentleman from Iowa says that this does not grant to these officers any greater privileges than to a Union soldier, I simply say to him that he has not come in here to make the Union soldier eligible to commission in the United States Army. We have got to repeal a whole code of laws that are now on our statute book before any Union soldier now in private life can become a commissioned officer in the United States Army. No man who held a commission during the late war and is now in private life can obtain such a commission.

We had to make a great fight here in Congress—a fight covering two or three years—in order to get the chief of the Union armies, a graduate of West Point, the greatest soldier of modern times, the privilege of simply being enrolled on the retired list of the United States Army; and I regret to say that the gentlemen in whose behalf this legislation is asked were the principal and most persistent opponents of that measure. There are gentlemen here who remember the case perfectly well—how even Ulysses S. Grant was prevented month after month and session after session from enjoying the privilege of being enrolled upon the retired list of the Army.

Gentlemen over here will perhaps say, "Oh, I do not like to take a position which may be misconstrued or criticised by somebody and place me in an attitude inimical to the views and desires of our brethren who were on the Confederate side in the late rebellion." My friends the gentlemen on the other side have never hesitated one moment in advocating their side of all these controversies. No man who served in the Confederacy felt at all estopped because he had participated in the rebellion from opposing the putting of General Grant on the retired list. No gentleman over there so far as I know felt estopped in the slighest degree from acting as a juror in the great case of the Union against Fitz John Porter when he was retired. They voted solidly to put Fitz John Porter on the retired list; they voted solidly that Ulysses S. Grant should not go on that list.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman tell us the name of one man who voted against the passage of that bill for Ulysses S. Grant?

Mr. BOUTELLE. They all voted against it.

Mr. WHEELER. The House voted unanimously for the bill; there was not a single vote against it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I know exactly what I am talking about. My memory is not so short as to have forgotten the circumstances. There are gentlemen here from the State of Iowa who know that we were unable even to get up the question and to have a vote on General Grant's case until we had surrendered the rights of a gentleman from Iowa who had a contested-election case pending here.

Mr. HULL, in his seat, addressed a remark to Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that a gentleman who was not here and who presumably does not know anything about this matter will not try to correct a gentleman who was here and who knows all about it. [Laughter.] There are other gentlemen here who know all about it. But for the benefit of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HULL], I will call upon another gentleman from Iowa [turning to Mr. HEPBURN] who was here to attest the truth of my statement that the Hon. James Wilson got up here after they had filibustered against getting up the Grant bill—notwithstanding the fact that the great Union Democrat, Samuel J. Randall, was the author, I think, or at any rate the sponsor of the bill—they refused to let the bill come up at all, a gentleman from North Carolina insisting that the contested-election case of somebody against Wilson from the State of Iowa should first be disposed of, an election case in which it was purposed to turn out a Republican and put in a Democrat, not only on the last day but in the last hours of the session. And finally, when we were at our wits' ends and feared that the gavel might fall and Congress adjourn and General Grant die before he could receive this honor at the hands of his countrymen, Mr. Wilson, to his honor be it said, arose in his seat in about that place [pointing] and said:

Mr. Speaker, if by my sacrifice justice can be done to General Grant, I ask my friends to let my case go.

And they did let his case go. He was turned out of this House and his successor was sworn in before we were permitted even to vote upon the proposition to put Ulysses S. Grant in his dying hours on the retired list of the United States Army. Now, I do not cite these facts to stir up strife. I have not brought the strife here. I cite this as a matter of history; and I cite it to show, as I said before, that, while gentlemen who served under the Confederate flag have never felt the slightest delicacy in rising here at any time and on any occasion to defend anything that they regarded as a right of theirs or their section or their cause, there is no reason why I or any other member who was on the other side of that question, who stood by the Government, should be ashamed, should crawl under the table, or try to repeal the righteous legislation to which this nation owes the preservation of its life.

It does no good. Congress ought to be dealing with other questions. The men who are affected by it probably do not desire to go into the Army. The very fact, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa himself, that some of these men are occupying high positions in the Government shows that they are probably satisfied as things exist. Presumably they do not want to go into the United States Army. Actually they can not do so. You would have to repeal the whole code of army laws before they can get there. On the other hand, none of us who have passed the years of military life expect to enter the military service or obtain commissions, except under very special cases or extraordinary circumstances, so that that fact has no practical bearing upon the question; and the only purpose of the passage of the measure is a sentimental one, to make gentlemen on that side of the House believe that gentlemen on this side are their friends. It is the old story of Dickens, "Codlin's your friend, not Short."

I think the presentation of the bill was a mistake. I say the man who got up the bill was not intelligently informed. There is no necessity for such a proposition. Let us forget it. And while I have been accredited with more or less aggressiveness, I have not been the author of such propositions. I have seen them brought here time and again. They continually crop up unduly and unnecessarily.

Now, a word to my friends on this side, the old Union soldiers. My friend Mr. PICKLER, the gentleman from South Dakota, wanted to know if the Union soldiers had protested against this. I ask him how many Union soldiers know that this bill is pending? Very few, I opine; very few, indeed. How many Union soldiers know that among the things that have been done to illustrate the kindness and generosity toward the Union soldier of the North is a provision in some portions of the constitution of a State of the South that amounts practically to a tax on a man if he served in the Union Army?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Will the gentleman be kind enough to specify what State?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The very question that the gentleman propounded to me shows that information on this subject is not so universally disseminated. I hold in my hand a copy of the constitution of the State of South Carolina. If there is some gentleman present who represents the State, I would like to ask him a question in connection with the matter.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. What portion of the constitution does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BOUTELLE. In answer to the gentleman from South Carolina I desire to ask him this question: If there is not a provision in the constitution of that State that imposes a tax upon the voters of the State generally, from which men are relieved if they served in the Confederate army?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I was a member, Mr. Speaker, of the convention which framed the State constitution——

Mr. BOUTELLE. And the gentleman must therefore be familiar with its provisions.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina (continuing). And the only discrimination made in the constitution of the State of South Carolina in favor of the soldiers of the Confederate army is the provision that those who are under 50 years of age, which is the road-working age, are exempt from road duty.

Every other citizen in the State between the ages of 18 and 50 is liable to this road duty; but the convention which framed the constitution of the State of South Carolina in its wisdom came to the conclusion that those soldiers who had represented the State in the war, who had given in many instances many years of their lives for the service of the State in the war, who had suffered physically and had been crippled perhaps, who had become to a large extent physically unable to do the work, that those citizens should be relieved from the necessity of working the roads. That is the only discrimination that is made in favor of them, with the exception of paying them a pension, which you give to the disabled who are decrepit and physically unable to earn a living. South Carolina is not ungrateful to the old soldiers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is South Carolina grateful to the Union soldiers for saving the Union and bringing South Carolina back into it?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. The Union is grateful to them, as the paying of the pensions indicate, which are paid by moneys raised from all parts of the country.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That does not exactly answer the inquiry. But did I mistake the facts in what I said?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Well, you must be the judge of that. I have stated that the only discrimination is that the soldiers who served during the war and are living and are under age are exempt from road duty. That is all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does it mean all the soldiers who served during the war?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. The Confederate soldiers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman be kind enough—he says he was a member of the constitutional convention and ought to be able to put his finger upon the provision—will he be kind enough to note in this pamphlet that I send him the provision in question and return it to me?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I will do so. I will say, further, that the war has been over for thirty years. Thirty years and eighteen added make forty-eight years, and only those gentlemen who are between 48 and 50 years of age are affected by the exemption in question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How old are the men who would be likely to be affected by this bill—men who held commissions in the United States Army in 1861?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Oh, I think it would affect very few of them; but in case of war, if the gentleman asks that question, he would find that these men who stood up to the dictates of their consciences and their sense of right then would be just as true to the Union——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Nobody questions it.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina (continuing). And would do just as valiant service as the gentleman from Maine or anybody else.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to please point out that paragraph in the constitution of his State. He is familiar with it.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. It will take me some time to find it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will help the gentleman. I know pretty nearly where it is. I do not yield the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, as a question of information, I should like to know which one of these gentlemen has the floor?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has the floor.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that I will try to find the paragraph which he desires. In the meantime I suggest that he continue in possession of the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask that the gentleman be given a moment or two.

Mr. WHEELER. In the meantime will the gentleman allow me to give him some information. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Wait a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to proceed?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed a few moments in which to find this paragraph.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Maine desire to proceed?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes, I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to proceed; but I desire to have this extract, because I want the absolute text of it.

Mr. WHEELER. Would you not like to find out something else first? You are wrong on everything. Get right on one thing at a time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am going to take one thing at a time. You come next. [Laughter.] I can not take South Carolina and Alabama all at once.

Mr. WHEELER. They are two pretty good States.

Mr. BOUTELLE. They are; and I do not want to get into antagonism with both of them at the same time.

Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of what I have to say I will repeat—while I can not quote the language verbatim—that the constitution of the State of South Carolina recently adopted contains a provision in regard to taxation, and, if I have not read mistakenly, I think it is a provision that the poll tax shall be so much, and there is a provision that this shall be levied substantially upon all persons except Confederate soldiers between the ages mentioned. Now, I do not think anybody will contradict that fact; and it shows a very different disposition, as I look at it—I may be biased; I may be prejudiced; I try not to be—it certainly does not seem to me to show that disposition which brings this bill in here. I am one, whether of few or of many, who still believe and really believe that, while it is well to make all the concessions in life that can justly and honorably and properly be made between individuals and between people, some of the concessions in regard to this matter of the strife against the Government of the United States ought to come from those who tried to destroy the Government.

I do not believe that any good purpose can be served, at a time when gentlemen who occupy this floor from day to day feel obliged to inveigh against a condition of things which brings thirty contested-election cases into this House, cases of such a character that gentlemen stand up here day after day and assert that the laws and the Constitution of the United States, affecting not only the rights of the citizens but which must affect the safety and welfare of the Government itself, are persistently and systematically violated over a large section of this country. These cases come in such numbers and with such glaring proportions that the House of Representatives of the United States has been compelled for the first time in its history, in order to do justice, in order to dispose of these controversies as to what the people of the Congressional districts have really decided in regard to their representation, to appoint three separate Committees on Elections to determine these cases.

Now, that does not show a condition of things which calls upon us to go back and rip up the necessary and righteous legislation of the war. I think that some of my friends on this side—and I say it without personal, individual application—would really be quite as well employed, would be doing quite as good service to this country, would be quite as much in line of their duty to liberty, to freedom, and to progress, if they had not been misinformed, as all of them said they were awhile ago, of the fact that the greatest discrimination was made in one of the States of the Union not only against their own comrades, but against the men who served under the flag of the Union. I think that we could have been more worthily occupied than in hunting up these statutes that were brought into this House and into the Senate by the lion-hearted men who stood like pillars and supported the fabric of Government in the hour of its peril, the men who upheld Abraham Lincoln's arm when the Government was tottering, and when nothing but armed resistance to men who had taken up arms against the Government could by any possibility give liberty to the future.

I say it is rather late in the day for us to make a definition of what constitutes the duty of a man who has a commission of the United States Government. I say that unless some great public benefit is to be accomplished, unless some great overshadowing peril or evil is to be avoided or evaded, we ought not to publish a lesson to-day that it is a light thing for a man to take his oath to support the Government of the United States and then draw his sword against it. I have nothing to do with the animosities of the past. Of the conditions that have been made I have nothing to do but to accept the situation. I draw no line against any man for the performance of any duty that has been assigned to him under the Constitution as it was or the Constitution as it has been amended. But I do say that I can not see how or why we are called here to-day to so act as to give an object lesson to those boys at Annapolis and those boys at West Point that will imbue them with the idea that their obligation to their Government is less sacred than it was believed to be in the time of Abraham Lincoln and Ulysses S. Grant.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want the boys of this country, whether at West Point or Annapolis, when they look at the possibility of service under the flag of their Government, to recognize that it is the obligation of a life, just as sacred as the signers of the Declaration of Independence regarded it when they pledged their lives and sacred honor to the cause.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not see any object to be attained by the passage of this bill that at all warrants us in putting this new construction upon the American idea of the duty of an American soldier and an American officer to his Government and to his flag.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow a question there?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine whether he seriously thinks that the removal in this proposition——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Some people say I always think seriously.

Mr. QUIGG. I have no doubt. If the gentleman will think seriously now, will he answer the question whether he thinks this proposition, at this time and under all the circumstances that surround us and the country, is going to give any such lesson as he suggests to young men?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do.

Mr. QUIGG. I do not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If it does not form some lesson there can be no practical effect in this. It can be passed for no reason under the heavens except to carry an impression to the public. It is a brutum fulmen in regard to the Army of the United States. It amounts to nothing in regard to the gentlemen who served on the other side. It means nothing, and it was brought in here for no purpose whatever except to give an impression to the public that we had reached in these years since the war a condition in which we looked with some leniency on the cause. We have looked with some leniency on those who participated, as I do myself very freely, and it would follow that we looked with more leniency upon the act itself. This I deny in the name of the American people. The people of this country to-day are as loyal to the flag, and their sentiment, I insist, is as inviolate as it was in 1861 to 1865. The flag of our country is just as precious and as sacred as it is to the man who takes the sword of the Government of the United States in his hand and kissing the hilt swears that he will wield it faithfully in the defense of his country, even with life itself, and it ought to mean just as much of an obligation in the present year and the years to come as it meant during the time of the late rebellion from 1861 to 1865.

Now, I ask gentlemen to consider this thing. If there was some advantage to be achieved, if there was to be one feather's weight even in bettering the condition of the people who are proscribed in any section of this country, the words of the constitution just adopted by South Carolina brings you notice that they have not admitted yet that the war is over, that they have not found out that strife is ended; but that to-day, in the organic law of that State, they have made a discrimination against the men who fought under the Union flag by making a discrimination specifically in favor of those who fought under the Confederate flag.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Maine I wish to say that I have discovered the portion of the constitution to which he refers, and the difference between my statement and the statement in the constitution is the difference between the poll tax and the road tax. The provision is as follows:

There shall be assessed on all taxable polls in the State between the ages of 21 and 60, excepting Confederate soldiers above the age of 50 years, an annual tax of $1 on each poll; the proceeds of which tax shall be expended for school purposes in the several school districts in which it is collected.

Now, I will say to the gentleman that it would be very difficult for him to find any others than Confederate soldiers among the veterans of the war in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I can find the gentleman a great many. That document was sent to me by one of them who is proscribed.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. You will find them only on the seacoast, among a certain portion of the population, a class of population who are receiving the benefit of nearly $1,000,000 of taxation for their public schools, this fund being used altogether for the public schools.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman entirely ignores the fact that there are white men from the North living in South Carolina. Why did you not include Union soldiers in that exemption, as you were a member of the constitutional convention?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Why do we not include Union soldiers in our pension laws? This is simply an act of gratitude on the part of South Carolina to those Confederate soldiers over the age of 50 years—not under—whom the people of South Carolina believe to have served the State sufficiently to justify this discrimination in their favor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very good. Then the gentleman from South Carolina says that his State, in making a new constitution more than thirty years after the war, still regarded the services of the Confederate soldiers as more valuable to the State and more entitled to recognition than the services of the Union soldiers who saved the life of the nation. Now, if that be so, I want to ask my friend from South Carolina this plain question, and I ask him to answer it candidly: If you in South Carolina are sincere in holding that the men who fought under your State flag and served against this Government are more entitled to the recognition and favor of South Carolina than the men who fought for the United States Government, do you not think that we here would better continue, as a Congress of the United States, to let this law stand, which holds that the men who fought for the Union, and held commissions in the Army and Navy of the United States, and were true to those obligations, are more entitled to recognition and favor by the Government of the United States? [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I will answer the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, I will not be drawn into a controversy which would amount to fighting the war all over again. Down South we believe that the war is over——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then why do you act so in making your State constitution?

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Wait one moment and I will tell you. The spirit which actuates us now is not one of resentment against the Union soldiers, but it is a spirit of gratitude to those who fought for the cause in which we were interested.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then let us exercise the same spirit here toward those who fought for the cause in which we were interested.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Maine that I regret to see one who has actually seen service, who was in the war, who has an honorable war record, who smelt powder—I regret, I say, to see such a man showing that he is still smelling powder. The war is over. The North can not get along any better without the South than the South can get along without the North.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield any longer. I appealed to the gentleman from South Carolina for information on this question of the discrimination in the constitution of his State, and it appears that he was a member of that convention, and I need make no argument as to his perfect confirmation of the statement I had made. The exemption of Confederate soldiers over 50 years of age of course excludes pretty nearly all the men in South Carolina who served in the Confederate army. We have the fact, then, that a State constitution, made within a year, in the State of South Carolina, discriminates in express terms against the Union soldiers living in that State. The men who made that constitution did not resort to any subterfuge; they came out plainly, and the gentleman from South Carolina tells us that they do it for the same reason that they pension Confederate soldiers, because they regard the services rendered by those soldiers as entitled to more favor and consideration on the part of South Carolina than the services of the men who fought to save the Union.

Mr. QUIGG. Is that a good example to follow?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York shall have an opportunity to be heard on that subject. If he wants to defend this South Carolina constitution I will ask that he be given time after I get through. I hope in the meantime that he will not disturb the thread of my remarks. I want to hear a defense of that South Carolina constitution, and I know that if I hear it at all I must hear it from somebody as young as the gentleman from New York [laughter], for no man who served in the Union army, no man who knows personally anything about the war, would ever think of palliating such a constitution, of palliating the conduct of a State which in the year 1896 makes a discrimination against the men to whom we owe the fact that we have a Government to-day.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WILSON] has spoken about the few men who served in the Union Army who are now in South Carolina. They are probably fewer than they would be if conditions there were different, but I remind him that there are at least enough of them to have two gentlemen contesting seats in this House and alleging that they would occupy those seats if the laws and the Constitution of the United States had been obeyed in the election.

Now, I was notified hurriedly that this bill was to come up. There are a number of things I would have been glad to say. Some one has sent me a memorandum which I will read—that one of these contestants in the States from which my friend would have us think there were no Union soldiers except down in the black belt or somewhere else, implying that there were only colored men—Col. Tom Johnson, now contesting the seat of Mr. STOKES of South Carolina, was a member of General Butler's command that marched through Baltimore——

A MEMBER. On the cars.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, on the cars, if the gentleman desires to be specific—freight cars, or whatever they were.

Mr. BARRETT. General Butler did not march through Baltimore.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, well, gentlemen, do not be microscopic in your criticisms. I remember once hearing old Senator Hamlin refer to a colleague in the Senate as a man who could see a fly on the barn door, but could not see the barn.

Mr. Speaker, I have said about all I want to say, and I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, had it been left to me to decide, I should not have introduced this bill into Congress. I do not believe, however, that it was introduced for any other than a patriotic and proper purpose; and the question now presented to us is whether we shall pass the bill or defeat it.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care particularly about the constitution of South Carolina. I do not want to add any fuel to the prospective flames of this debate; but I will venture to suggest that possibly the present constitution of South Carolina was made without a great deal of reference to the Constitution of the United States—made more as a protest against it than as an indorsement of it.

The question is asked whether that constitution, in so far as it undertakes to favor a class of persons, can be defended. Well, I have to say just this about that constitution: It is a question for each State to make such discrimination in favor of classes of helpless and suffering people as the citizens of that State may see fit to make. I think for myself that it is a very unwise provision to put into a constitution. I believe that one of the great evils of American legislation and American statesmanship to-day is the disposition to crowd into State constitutions a great mass of matter which is properly legislation—nothing else than legislation, such provisions as have no proper place in the organic law of a State. It has possibly been unfortunate for South Carolina that a party in that State got possession of power, and fearing that they might not be able to hold the legislative power of the State, put into the constitution a lot of provisions that will undoubtedly be a seeding of dragon's teeth that will grow up to afflict that Commonwealth.

But a State has a right in the exercise of its police power and in its care for the unfortunate to exempt from taxation classes of individuals; and that police power is wisely executed when the class to be exempted is composed of people who in the main are helpless and would otherwise become indigent and after awhile become chargeable upon the public. So in many States we exempt the Union soldier in some measure from taxation, not especially as a commendation of him, but in order to save the country from a burden that otherwise would be hard to bear. In the State of New York, in the State of Connecticut, in the State of Ohio, I know that this is so. In the State of Pennsylvania the Union soldier is not required to pay a license tax to engage in peddling and other matters of that sort. More than that, I understand he gets a license which no other man can get, and gets it without making any payment. Now, such things are done not only to testify our appreciation of the Union soldier, but are also in the nature of a public provision to aid him.

Now, let us see whether it is very strange after all that South Carolina should look about her among her helpless classes—or I will not say South Carolina; I will say all the States of the South—and do something to aid those people and to keep them out of the poorhouse, for, after all, notwithstanding a man may have served in the rebel army, notwithstanding he is an ex-Confederate soldier, the public owes to him bread and clothing and lodging and fire, and if he can not get them in any other way he will have to get them at the public expense as a matter of charity.

Now, we pension the Union soldier very liberally. The Confederate soldier is not pensioned. But South Carolina aids the Union soldier by paying her share (it is a very small proportion) of the pensions of the country; and then, in order that the ex-Confederates may be kept out of the poorhouse, many of the States of the South confer small pensions upon the Confederate soldier. I have never heard that anybody complained of that. I do not complain, most assuredly. I would go a long way to aid the man who bore a musket against me in the time of war [applause], much farther than I would go to aid the man in the North who stood and howled and hissed at me when I was doing the best that I could in the South. [Applause.]

Now, then, the question has come before us here; and the challenge is made by the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I challenged nobody; I am not in the challenging business; and right here, if the gentleman will permit me, I desire to disclaim——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody yields to the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman called my name—I want to put it on that ground—he need not yield unless he desires to do so; but when a gentleman calls another by name he ought to allow a reply.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I simply want to say this—I should not have thought it necessary, perhaps, if some other gentleman than the gentleman from Ohio had appeared on the floor—but I simply desire to say——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have spoken here to-day on my own behalf, and not as representing any candidate for the Presidency of the United States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now my friend from Maine, when he recovers a little, will not be very proud of that remark.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am absolutely proud of it; and I do not want anybody to be responsible except myself for what I do or say.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Nor will anybody be responsible for my speeches. And in that connection, Mr. Speaker, let me ask, is it possible that we have reached such a condition of affairs in this country that when a man is in favor of A for the Presidency, or B or C, that every time he gets up here to say something on on any subject somebody is to call attention to the fact and proclaim aloud that his advocacy of an entirely independent measure has something to do with that candidacy? Is that manly politics? Or is that argument on such a question as this?

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not answer the gentleman from Maine in kind. What I was saying was this: That he challenged a reason for the passage of this bill. Well, I used the word challenged. He demanded to know—and put it at our distinguished chairman of the committee with considerable vim two or three times—he demanded to know the necessity or the reason for the passage of this bill. Now, I called that a challenge.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I will be glad to be informed on that very point.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I am seeking to inform you now, and if you had been quiet a little while and had allowed me to go on, you would have had full information by this time. [Laughter.]

It is said that the passage of this bill would not add anybody to the United States Army. Well, I do not know whether it will or not. I place my support of the bill upon the grounds that in so far as my action in this legislative body goes it shall be to make possible the highest degree of loyalty and love of country on the part of every man who served in the Confederate army during the war. [Applause.] The time may come—the time has come—when we want unity and loyalty on both sides of Mason and Dixon's line. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that it does not exist to-day on both sides of the line?

Mr. GROSVENOR. On the contrary, I think it does.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman intimate that something is needed on the part of the Government of the United States toward these people to warrant them in being loyal?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is always necessary and proper for a great government to do what is right and fair and just for all of its people. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman say that this legislation which you seek now to repeal was not just and right and fair?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has already made his speech. We passed provisions of law in years gone by that disfranchised every man of a great class in this community. They were not allowed to vote. They could not even have the use of the mails, and where are all these restrictions now? We took them off one by one as the years went on; we took them off of every man who came forward and said: "I have had enough of this, and am loyal to the United States Government." We took off the disabilities that we had passed in order to testify that the original purpose of the rebellion was right? Was that the purpose? By no manner of means. That was not the intent; such a thought never entered into the minds of the lawmakers. It was because under the blessings of a restored Government we proposed that every man should have an equal chance to again work out his salvation as an American citizen without legal disabilities. [Applause.] We took them from the men who graduated at West Point, who had forsworn their obligations to the Government and went into the Confederate army to fight against the Union; we took the disabilities from them and took them back again.

Where are they to-day? They are in this body. They are in the Senate of the United States, a coordinate branch of this Government. They are on the Supreme Bench of the United States. They are in the Cabinet of the Administration of this Government and they were in the Cabinet of a Republican President of the United States. Aye, more than that, Mr. Speaker, there was one in the Cabinet of that very same General Grant, the glorious general of the United States Army, whom my friend pronounces so high an encomium upon—they were in the Cabinet of General Grant. [Applause.] It was General Grant, the great leader of the Union armies, who sent to a foreign country the cavalry raider from Virginia; it was General Grant who gave Longstreet, the bravest and, in my humble judgment, and with all due respect to the opinion of others who differ with me, the ablest of the Confederate leaders, a high position in the civil service of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Was he not ostracized throughout the South from that very fact?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, that is an entirely different question. I am talking now of the policy of the Government.

It was General Grant who made it possible for Fitz John Porter, a Union general, to go on the retired list of the Army. It was General Grant who used his mighty influence to procure the passage of that act. So at every step of the way we have been trying to remove these disabilities. I am as vigorous in my adherence to the Republican party and as partisan as it is proper for any American citizen to be; but when a man comes forward who served in the Confederate army and says to me, "Here is a little distinction left, as a mere remnant of that which rested upon us in our long years of wrong and trouble; take it away," I am willing to take it away. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to say who has ever said that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Said what?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Who brought this bill forward?

Mr. GROSVENOR. God only knows. I do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do you know that any Southern man has asked for it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not know that.

Mr. PEARSON. Why, yes; the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If there was a man from the South begging for it I should not feel as anxious to give it to him as I am to give it to him as the free act and deed of this side of the House. [Applause.]

Furthermore, now, why should this be kept upon these people? It is said that the repeal of this act would be a reflection upon its original passage. Is that possible? Did Abraham Lincoln reflect upon the original disabilities that were put upon the Confederate soldier when he recommended to Congress that they be relieved, and to a Republican Congress at that? It was a Republican Congress which lifted these disabilities. Did old Thad Stevens and

John A. Bingham and Garfield and Schenck and that class of men inveigh against the original propriety of those disabilities because they removed them? Did Grant suffer in his loyalty to the country when he made his famous proclamation that sent a thrill of gratitude through the hearts of the Southern people and was the producing cause of the greatest encomiums ever given to him, when he told those Confederate soldiers to take their horses home and make crops with them? I can condemn the bad legislation of the South without standing here to object to removing a disability such as this.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I might elaborate upon this point. Let me tell my friends here what I have looked forward to with hope, and I have wanted to live long enough after the war until I could see it. I have wanted to live long enough to see the policy of the great party to which I belong operate to restore the Union absolutely, so it would be again—

A union of hearts and a union of hands;
A union of States none could sever.

I have aided in my feeble way to put into the Constitution barriers against which the gates of rebellious hell can never again prevail.

I have voted for the amendments to that Constitution that guarantee equal rights to the people of the whole country, and I have wanted to live to hear the proclamation go out to other countries, "My country is united; my country is loyal; the wounds and stains of war have been abolished and wiped out in the growth of American patriotism and American statesmanship and intelligence." [Applause.] I have wanted to see the time come when, if war with a foreign country should arise, my countrymen North and South, those who suffered under these disabilities and those who have grown up, the young men of the South, might feel just as zealous, just as anxious, just as patriotic, as the young men who have grown up in the North; and I believe, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding some of the bad legislation, notwithstanding some of the contested-election cases in this House—I believe that time has come. I believe the time has come when the man of South Carolina, the man of Georgia, the man of Texas, the man of Ohio and Pennsylvania, and the man of California feel the same pride in our country that I feel, the same reverence for the flag that I feel, and I want no class of men in my country carrying a load that I am not willing to carry. [Applause.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOPKINS. I make the point that the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House any member is at liberty to make a motion which will close the morning hour, but the morning hour does not expire of itself.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, was I recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. GROW. I propose to trespass but briefly upon the attention of the House at this time. National disasters have fallen upon all nations that preceded us, and in our case a mighty disaster befell this generation. The soil of England was drenched for long years in the blood of her best citizens in the War of the Roses; and yet when that struggle passed from the consideration of the living generation who took part in it, the asperities of its animosities ceased, and where is the Englishman to-day who remembers the antagonisms and strife of that period?

Slavery was the cause of the rebellion in this country. Our habits of thought are, to a great extent, creatures of our surroundings. We are all born and reared under certain influences, which develop certain traits of character. Had the men of Massachusetts been born and reared for generations in South Carolina, when the iron hail beat on the walls of Sumter, they would have joined in rebellion, as did the men born in South Carolina. And if the men of South Carolina had been born and reared in Massachusetts for generations under her surrounding influences, they would have united, as she did, in upholding the institutions bequeathed by our fathers. What caused the rebellion—the moving, educating element—is gone forever, and no one sheds a tear on its grave. To-day all who dwell upon American soil under the flag of our fathers are surrounded by similar influences, and will erelong forget the bygones except as a warning for the future, if they have not already done so.

When this mighty conflict was at its height and the roar of hostile cannon was heard from one end of the country to the other, 18,000,000 people stood like the youth in the streets of Paris when it was rumored that Mirabeau was dying. He had listened to his impassioned eloquence in the Corps Légistatif, and rushing to his physician he eagerly inquired, "What is the matter with Mirabeau?" and when told that he was dying for want of blood, stripping bare his arm, he exclaimed: "Take the blood from my veins and put in his, and let Mirabeau live." So 18,000,000 of the American people, when danger hung over the perpetuity of the Union bequeathed by our fathers, baring their bosoms, exclaimed: "Take our hearts' blood and let the Republic live."

The men in arms for the destruction of the Union were inspired by the institution of slavery, and would never have gone to the battle for its overthrow only from such influences. What caused the rebellion has passed away forever, leaving a Union saved and a country free. While our fathers were among the wisest of men that ever laid the corner stone of empire, yet in the grand temple of liberty which they reared they left the cankerworm of human bondage to gnaw at the vitals of free institutions until the crisis hour came when one or the other must die, and slavery was the victim.

The world is ever ready with its meed of praise for valor and deeds of heroic self-sacrifice, whether in the Spartan at Thermopylæ, the Old Guard at Waterloo, or Pickett's dauntless charges at Gettysburg.

But 'tis the cause makes all,
Degrades or hallows courage in its fall.

A victorious party in a carnival of blood can not in this age convert itself into a party of perpetual hates. Hates and rancors must sometime have an end. Let us bury with the heroic dead the animosities engendered in the conflict and remember only that we are all American citizens, glorying in the traditions of a common ancestry, and henceforth vying with each other in deeds of patriotic devotion for the greatness and the glory of the Republic. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question? If devotion to the Government, if patriotism is a matter of locality, and if it be true that the people of Massachusetts to-day are entitled to no special credit for being loyal, and the people of South Carolina, or Alabama, if you choose, are entitled to no special condemnation because they were disloyal, does not the gentleman think that he ignores a great fact and does great injustice to that body of loyal men who, in Tennessee and in North Carolina, in Missouri, in Kentucky, and in West Virginia, in spite of the fact that they were domiciled with slavery; in spite of the fact of their locality; in spite of the fact of their minority; in spite of the fact of their proscription and the sufferings for which they fled to the mountains for refuge—does he not think these men are entitled to some consideration, to more honor from the Government of the United States, than those who voluntarily engaged in fighting to destroy the Government? It seems to me that we can not afford to argue on the basis that if we had lived somewhere else we should have done as somebody else did. You can make that argument in favor of anything that any man or set of men ever did anywhere.

I hold that the people of Massachusetts and of New York and of Pennsylvania were loyal to this Government for other reasons than because they lived in those States. They were not the men who were gathered under a sudden impulse into the Army; they were the thoughtful, patriotic bone and sinew of those States, who left their homes, their shops, their vocations, and went to the field because they believed a great principle was involved, and you must give them proper credit for it. And those men in the South who were born amid slavery and surrounded by it in the States to which I have referred, yet who were faithful to the Union, can not be ignored by simply referring to patriotism as a matter of sectionalism or locality.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me a moment to reply to the question which the gentleman from Maine has asked me and which implies that I have not a proper sense of patriotism?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg the gentleman's pardon; no man would think of implying anything of that kind.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his motion to adjourn for me to answer the question put by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will not withdraw the motion, but I will withhold it long enough to enable the gentleman from Pennsylvania to answer the question.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will withdraw the motion temporarily and desires me to renew it, I will do so at the conclusion of my remarks, or I will leave it for him to renew it.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, we all know that there is a great principle of patriotism in the human breast, formed by the surrounding associations of childhood in the community in which we were born or in which we may chance to live, and there is a sense of justice implanted in every human heart, but each of these feelings or senses can be shaded more or less in its development by the circumstances of childhood and youth and by the influences surrounding our manhood. I depreciate not the valor, the patriotism, the self-sacrifice of the men of Massachusetts. I made mention of them only by way of illustration, and did not intend any disparagement of their patriotic services.

We all know that patriotism springs from the associations of childhood in the land in which we are born, and it is just as strong in the people of one nation as in those of another. The men of east Tennessee, to whom the gentleman from Maine has referred, never were demoralized or corrupted by the institutions of human bondage. And the same is true of the men in the border States, whose heroic self-sacrifice in the cause of the Union was never surpassed. It was the cotton States that led in the rebellion, that portion of the South where slavery had become the dominant idea, the controlling sentiment in politics and in the social relations, so that even on this floor there was a time when a question presented, directly or indirectly involving the question of slavery, on all such occasions there was a solid vote from the cotton States in favor of slavery.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. GROW. I do not wish to enter into any controversy. I only desire to be understood. Patriotism, justice, the sentiment of humanity are born in the human heart, but their development is greatly influenced and controlled by the influences that surround us, the atmosphere in which we grow to manhood. It was slavery that molded the habits and thought of the men who made and led the rebellion. I use the word now in no invidious sense when I say that slavery made its devotees traitors to the Union. It was not the impulse of their hearts; it was not the patriotism inculcated by the associations and the history and the traditions of our country.

The object that sent them to the tented field was to defend what they considered an institution for their benefit, because, as we all know, they proposed to found a republic upon slavery as its corner stone. Now slavery has gone. It vanished in the expiring flames of civil war, and the martyred President, sealing with his blood the emancipation of a race, bore 4,000,000 broken manacles to the throne of eternal justice. The great cause of all the trouble and disaster to our country having disappeared forever, we can all rejoice to-day, victor and vanquished alike, in one Union, one people, one flag, and one destiny, now and forevermore. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. Now will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROW. The floor belongs to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary question. If we adjourn now when does this bill come up again under the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. In the morning hour, the next time we have one.

Mr. HULL. When the committee is again called. I hope, Mr. Speaker, we shall not adjourn. Let us finish the bill now.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how much time I have remaining.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has about three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. HULL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to occupy the time of the House upon this question, and I would not do so had not the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] referred to me specifically. I have a great regard for the opinions of the gentleman from Maine upon such questions as this generally, but it seems to me that in this particular case he has the wrong side of the question.

Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to the following section of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Now, I desire the attention of the gentleman from Maine. He wants to know what is the object of this proposed legislation and whether it will not be a reflection upon all legislation of this character and those who enacted it if we should now pass this bill. I want to call his attention to the section I have just read and remind him that that section has been repealed as to different classes therein described by no less than five acts now on the statute book, in the interest of the men of the South, in the interest of the Confederate soldier. It was repealed on March 9, 1878, for the benefit of the soldiers of the Confederate service in regard to pensions arising out of the war of 1812, to the extent that the soldiers or widows of the war of 1812 should not be longer debarred of their pension on account of the soldier's subsequent Confederate service. It was repealed on March 3, 1877, as to soldiers who afterwards voluntarily enlisted in the Army of the United States and incurred disability in line of duty; it was repealed January 29, 1887, as to the survivors and widows of the Mexican war; it was repealed July 7, 1892, as to survivors and widows of the Indian wars; and it was repealed August 1, 1892, as to the Navy, placing sailors on the same footing as soldiers of the Army. In the interest of the Confederate soldier the section which I have read, a section in which there is substance, a section which affects their receipt of money and which has voted pensions to them, or rather restored them to pensions, has been repealed as to certain classes by no less than five acts of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask why he thinks that remark is pertinent as addressed to me?

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman appealed to me personally, and he asked of me and of the House the question if it would not be a reflection upon the legislators who put the section in question on the statute book to now repeal it. The same argument applies in the cases I have cited, and does the gentleman think that the repeal of the law I have cited was any reflection upon those enacting it?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Suppose it does; what have I to do with it?

Mr. PICKLER. That is what surprises me—that a gentleman with the good judgment and fairness of the gentleman from Maine, a gentleman who I know has a friendly feeling toward the Confederate soldiers—I do not doubt that for a moment——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Nor do I.

Mr. PICKLER. It surprises me, I repeat, that the gentleman should raise such a commotion about this bill. The gentleman talks about the war being forgotten. It does not seem to me that the gentleman's speech is conducive to that result.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. PICKLER. I trust I shall have a little more time——

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman has cited a section here which he says has been in several instances repealed. Does he hold me responsible for that? Does he assume that I indorse everything that this House has ever done?

Mr. PICKLER. I do not hold you responsible; but no one, as far as I know, has ever complained of the repeals I have cited.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I voted against the repeal of that law.

Mr. PICKLER. I think that when Congress can afford to forgive these Confederate soldiers five different times in a matter affecting money payments to them, it can here in this case, where there is simply a shadow at stake, where it would show an act of magnanimity by the Government toward these men and show that we believe them in earnest in support of the Government and the flag. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then urge the inconsistency upon men who voted for the repealing legislation. I did not.

Mr. PICKLER. I can not yield further. But the gentleman would have surrendered no principle had he so voted, and as one of the victors he could have well shown such magnanimity toward the vanquished. I voted for two of these repeals and I am proud of it.

Mr. Speaker, in the war of the rebellion the men of the North and the men of the South had no enmity against each other as individuals; we were fighting for principle; the South claimed the same. And I am glad to concede to the men of the South the same courage, the same resolution, the same determination that I claim for soldiers of the Union Army. In reference to all such acts as these, which are designed to tone down the rancor resulting from the war, it is enough to say that we were right and that the men who were opposed to us were wrong; and when that is conceded, as it must be when the question arises, I am willing that they should have the credit of all the bravery of American soldiery and that they should enjoy all the honors of American citizenship. [Applause.] The gentleman quoted Grant. Has not Grant, above all others, set us the example for such action as this? It was Grant who said in his own time, "Let us have peace." [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman please state what I quoted from General Grant? I should like the gentleman to keep somewhere near the earth when he refers to me.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman alluded to Grant several times.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I did allude to him.

Mr. PICKLER. Several times.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I alluded to a specific case.

Mr. PICKLER. And I am alluding to a specific case, when he said to the Confederate officers, "Retain your side arms," and when, as quoted by the gentleman from Ohio, he said to the men in the ranks, "Take home your horses; you will need them to raise crops and earn a living."

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I was in favor of that.

Mr. PICKLER. I will allude to another specific case. Year after year since I have been here, when we were asking legislation for the Union soldier, when we were asking liberal pensions for men who fought the battles of the Union—and we are asking much for the Union soldier, and the nation can never pay him all it owes him—I have found (and this has had much to do with my forming my opinions along these lines)—the Confederate soldier rarely, if ever, opposing a pension to a Union soldier. For one I appreciate this action of the Confederate soldier.

I am in favor of marking all of the battle grounds, or wherever there was a skirmish, by proper monuments throughout the country, so as to let our children have something historical to point with undying luster to the heroism of our brave soldiers. We go to Europe and look over the great battlefields of the wars of the past, and it is a matter of history and pride to the people of the various nations that all of these great fields are marked by commemorative monuments of some kind. And so, Mr. Speaker, we should mark the battlefields of this greatest war in history, and the prowess, bravery, and courage of American soldiers on these fields, and the great result attained will be the common heritage of the whole nation in all the years to come. [Applause.] I join with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in hoping that the time will soon come when all of these statutes, with the magnanimity of passing years, will be obliterated from our statute books, though still adhering to the declaration that the defenders of the Union were right in that great contest.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would rather indorse the sentiment, I would prefer to uphold the sentiment of that other great patriot of our country, who has been referred to by the gentleman from Maine, and commend the sentiment that he so ably expressed in a paragraph in his first inaugural address—I allude to Abraham Lincoln, of whom it has been said that he "paled the glory of Hastings in the preservation of an Empire and won comparison with Hampden for self-command and rectitude of purpose, while as the emancipator of a race he stands alone in his solitary glory without a rival and without a parallel." [Prolonged applause.] I say that I would rather indorse the sentiments which he so ably expressed, and which I commend to the consideration of the gentleman from Maine, than those sentiments which would still keep alive the bitterness of our late strife. He said:

I am loath to close. We are not enemies but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battlefield and every patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature.

[Applause.]

Let us bind by one more cord in memory's chain patriot grave with living heart and hearthstone by erasing this statute from our nation's laws.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman kindly inform me what was the response to that sentiment of Mr. Lincoln, and when it was uttered?

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, Mr. Speaker, it was uttered before the war, in March, 1861.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And what was the response?

Mr. PICKLER. And that is just the trouble with the gentleman from Maine. He wants this great Government to take up and resent the vindictive laws of the Southern States passed since the war and emulate them in their rancor and spirit of enmity. That we can not afford to do. Let us as a great nation, as a victorious people, rise above any spirit of resentment, and with brotherly magnanimity accept with a generous spirit and recognize as honest the pledges and promises that have been made on the part of these men who took part in the rebellion, and when they tell us that they are loyal to the flag let us welcome the statement as true and believe it, and let us place such laws on the statute books of the country as will indicate the sincerity of our belief. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WALKER]. [Applause.]

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not know when or by whom this bill was introduced into this House. I am sure that if it had been known that it would be the occasion of the renewal of heartburnings between the North and South it would never have been introduced. I had fondly hoped that it would receive the unanimous support of every member of this body. But it is here and it must be acted on, and I believe that much depends on its passage.

Its enactment will do much toward the promotion of harmony and good feeling in the South. We are told that there is no practical good to be attained by the repeal of this restriction, and that it is urged as a mere sentiment. Mr. Speaker, let us admit this for the sake of the argument. Is there not something, after all, in sentiment? Is not sentiment often a thing which is right and just and holy? And if this is a sentiment, is it not a sentiment which leads us in the right direction—a sentiment that leads to peace and brotherly kindness?

Admit, if you choose, that Stonewall Jackson and Robert E. Lee, who were educated at West Point, and whom all must admit were Christian gentlemen, were guilty a great wrong when they left the Federal Army and espoused the cause of the Southern Confederacy. Let us remember that "to err is human, to forgive divine."

There is to-day a sentiment rapidly growing in the minds and hearts of the Southern people of love for this nation, for its Constitution, its laws, its flag, and its institutions which gentlemen on this floor who do not have the opportunity of mingling freely with the masses of our people can scarcely believe or appreciate.

I proclaim here, in sincerity and truth, that with the exception of a few Bourbons, who can never forget and who will never learn, the Southern people entertain the warmest and most affectionate feelings for the Government. We claim it as our Government. We are in this Union to stay, and we claim that we should be equal before the law. If we have sinned, we have suffered. Is there no atonement? The riches of a nation consist not in material things, but in the patriotism, the devotion, and the courage of its sons. This bill asks no material aid, it asks no indorsement of the past; but it asks that the ban which forbids freemen from defending their native land from foreign invasion be removed, and that this country be allowed to accept the services of all willing hands if an emergency arises which calls for their help. These gentlemen desire to prove their devotion and loyalty, and if a foreign war shall come you will find them in the front ranks fighting for the cause of their country.

But this is not a mere sentiment; it is a practical question, which appeals to the patriotism of every gentleman on this floor.

There are many men in the South who were educated at West Point, and who are young enough to render military service, and who are true and tried soldiers.

I doubt if there is an officer to-day in the Federal Army who could render more efficient service to this country in war than the Lees or WHEELER or a number of other Confederate officers who were educated at West Point, and I know there are none who would render such services more willingly and patriotically.

There are 2,000 of the kinsmen and descendants of these officers who would be found ready to die for the old flag if called upon to do so, and who would shed their blood more readily and more abundantly if they knew that this great Government had been magnanimous to their fathers and their kindred.

A foreign war may come to this nation sooner than we think for which will tax the energies and the resources of the United States to their fullest capacity, and I ask if you would deny to the men who fought in the Confederate army the privilege of fighting for their country and carrying the flag of their country? That is all this law asks.

Mr. STEELE. The law would not affect you, as you were not educated at West Point.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. It would not affect me. I was not educated at West Point; but I will say now for myself that if this nation needed my services I should be glad to render them, and I would render them as heartily and as cheerfully as I ever fought on any battlefield during the late war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PEARSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if he did not lead the glorious brigade of Stonewall Jackson after that hero's death?

Mr. HULL. I will give the gentleman a minute more.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. I will answer the gentleman's question. I had that honor, and I am proud of it, because I am proud to have been considered worthy to lead that brigade. [Applause.] I want to say again that there are thousands of men in the South who served in the late war who are as true and as loyal to this Government to-day as I am or as any man in this Hall.

Let me say one word more. I want to say to the Republicans in this House—and I do not speak from a sectional standpoint—that to-day the hearts of the people, and more especially the Southern soldiers, are turning to the Republican party. Some gentleman said that Longstreet was ostracized for joining the Republican party. That is true, but that day has passed. Men are ostracized no more there on account of their political opinions; and I want to say that the fact that Longstreet and men like him have suffered for their opinions is another reason why we want to ask you as Republicans as well as patriots to remove this ban and say, in the language of General Grant, "Let us have peace." Let us rub out all trace of sectional animosities. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question to make a correction?

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think the gentleman inadvertently said that there were thousands of sons of these men and thousands of men in the South who bore commissions——

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. BOUTELLE. In looking over the gentleman's remarks he can correct the statement if he made it. I understood the gentleman to say that there are thousands of men in the South who held commissions in the Union Army at the outbreak of the war.

Mr. WALKER of Virginia. No; I did not mean that.

Mr. STEELE. You said thousands of their sons.

Mr. HULL. As this debate has certainly been fair to those opposed to the bill in allowing them to have a large proportion of the time and as it is getting late now, I move the previous question.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I appeal to the gentleman to yield to me three minutes.

Mr. HULL. I can not yield.

Mr. CUMMINGS. As a representative of the War Democracy at the outbreak of the war, I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. HULL. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, General Grant was a War Democrat. If he was on this floor to-day there would be no question about the passage of this bill in view of his action at Appomattox.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of 800,000 War Democrats in the North who marched to the front to sustain this Union during the war. They fought loyally for the Union. On behalf of every one of those Democrats I appeal to the House to support this bill. Grant himself would advocate it if he were alive. Mr. Speaker, if you remember, the War Democracy were an important factor in the country at the outbreak of the war. Abraham Lincoln was the Republican candidate for President in 1860. He was the Union candidate for President in 1864. So far as party names were concerned, the Republican party was blotted from existence during the war, just as much as the Whig and the Federal party were before the war. As a War Democrat I voted for the Union ticket. As a War Democrat I voted for General Grant, the nominee for the Presidency in 1868.

Mr. STEELE. Every vote against him was cast by a Democrat.

Mr. CUMMINGS. And many a vote for him also. I cast my vote for him a second time. If he had been nominated for the third time, imperialism or no imperialism, I might have voted for him. [Great applause.] His action at Appomattox showed him to be a true representative of the War Democracy. In the light of the terms granted there I hope that not a Confederate soldier on this floor will vote on this question one way or the other.

A MEMBER. That is right.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let them maintain a dignified silence. Throw the responsibility where it belongs. If there are Republicans who desire to maintain this barrier thirty years after the war, let them speak for themselves. After listening to the speech of my old friend the commander of the gallant Stonewall brigade, [Mr. WALKER]—I call him my old friend, for I have met the Stonewall brigade on the field of battle—let them go on record. If they desire to say to these men to whom General Grant extended the hand of brotherly love at Appomattox; if they desire to say that Grant was wrong and that thirty years afterwards they are right, let them vote down the bill and take the responsibility. [Loud applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. I demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. CROWTHER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. An amendment is not in order. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HULL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that, the Chair desires to lay before the House a report of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter;

A bill (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes";

A bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona;

A bill (S. 2251) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River; and

A bill (H. R. 5286) providing for disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath hay reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WELLINGTON, for three days, on account of death in his family.

CORRECTION OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 797) authorizing the Secretary of War to exchange with the Oregon National Guard, of the State of Oregon, Springfield rifles of the pattern of 1884 for the same make of rifles of the pattern of 1873, and for other purposes, and the same was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers of the Army, giving information in relation to the breakwater in Marquette Bay, in Lake Superior—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of reasons for the enactment of a draft of a bill pending before the Indian Affairs Committee, submitted by the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the rights of a United States officer or agent to make arrests of Indians upon Indian reservations—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of State, recommending an appropriation for a subscription to the International Prison Commission and for the expenses of the American member thereof; also transmitting two inclosures—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

SAN CARLOS INDIAN RESERVATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an agreement negotiated by United States Indian Inspector McCormick and the Indians of the San Carlos Reservation for the cession and relinquishment to the United States of a certain portion of that reservation, together with reports from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and also a draft of a bill ratifying and confirming the agreement and recommending favorable action by Congress; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WATER-SUPPLY INVESTIGATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, a letter from the Director of the Geological Survey containing a statement of the investigation by the Geological Survey now in progress under the clause in the appropriation act approved March 2, 1895, for gauging the streams and determining the water supply of the United States, etc.; which, with the accompanying statement, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present the petition of William F. Warren, president of Boston University, and 7 other members of the faculty of that university, in favor of a grant of land in New Mexico by the Government to be used as a resort for the alleviation and cure of persons suffering from pulmonary diseases. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago I introduced a bill to establish a life-saving station at or near Hampton, N. H. I present the petition of Frank Jones and a large number of other citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the passage of that bill. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented a petition of the Merchants' National Bank of Savannah, Ga., praying that authority be given the national banks to increase their circulation from 90 per cent to 100 per cent of the par value of their bonds, and favoring the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency that the tax on circulation be reduced from 1 per cent to one-fourth of 1 per cent; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PRINTING OF FINANCIAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a communication from the Acting Director of the Mint, transmitting a statement of the coinage of gold and silver of France from 1795 to 1874, inclusive. I move that the communication be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 16, 1896, addressed to me, relative to the amount of silver bullion now on hand, the cost of the same, and the coinage value if coined into dollars, and the amount of seigniorage if so coined, etc. I move that the communication be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present copies of correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. H. McCulloch, and the assistant treasurer at New York, Mr. Thomas C. Acton, January, 1885, relative to the payments to be made through the clearing house, whether in gold or silver dollars, or representative certificates. I move that the correspondence be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2367) to complete the military record of Dennis Whidly, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2338) for the relief of Joshua Bishop, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2352) granting an increase of pension to Francis L. Abbott, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2274) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Chamberlain, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 470) granting to the State of Washington certain lands therein situated for the purpose of a fish hatchery, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 115) for the relief of the estate of Ramsay Crooks, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 18th instant, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, reported it favorably, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE, from the Committee on Indian Depredations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 229) for the relief of Robert McGee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 888) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Capital Railway Company," approved March 2, 1892, heretofore reported by him.

ACCEPTANCE OF DECORATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 107) to authorize Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, and Prof. Asaph Hall, United States Navy, to accept decorations from the Government of the Republic of France, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. The joint resolution is very short, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF MEDALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a joint resolution, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution (S. R. 111) to authorize Benjamin Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him while President of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That Benjamin Harrison be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept certain medals presented to him by the Governments of Brazil and Spain during the term of his service as President of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. Let the joint resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

Ground Company, near Greensboro, N. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. I introduce a joint resolution which I ask shall be read at length, and after such reading that it shall lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. R. 113) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed for ratification by legislatures in the several States, which, when ratified by legislatures in three-fourths of the United States, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"Neither Congress nor any State shall pass any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or use the property or credit of the United States, or of any State, or any money raised by taxation, or authorize either to be used, for the purpose of founding, maintaining, or aiding, by appropriation, payment for services, expenses, or otherwise, any church, religious denomination, or religious society, or any institution, society, or undertaking, which is wholly or in part under sectarian or ecclesiastical control."

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. TURPIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to submit a resolution which fixes the time for the adjournment of Congress. I think it is time that that matter shall be considered.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 2d day of May, at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose the resolution must be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 23d instant approved and signed the act (S. 1716) for the relief of W. H. Ferguson, administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Millsaps.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 24th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 79) directing the Secretary of War to furnish an estimate for deepening the channel from Hampton Roads to the navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., and also for improving the Western Branch of the Elizabeth River.

REPORT ON WAR IN CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. ELKINS instructing the Committee on Foreign Relations to submit to the Senate before the vote is taken on what is known as the Cuban resolutions, now pending before the Senate, or the resolutions on the war in Cuba that passed the Senate, a report giving all the facts and findings of the committee in support of said resolutions.

Mr. PEFFER. I do not see the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] in his seat and——

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from West Virginia, who submitted the resolution, told me yesterday that he desires to have it laid on the table, but I think it had better go over until he comes in.

Mr. PEFFER. It had better go over and retain its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from West Virginia told me that he intends to have the resolution laid on the table, but I think it had better go over in the ordinary way in his absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over without prejudice.

BLACK RIVER BRIDGE, IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to place on its passage the bill (S. 1724) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Black River, in Louisiana.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "point," to insert "suitable to the interests of navigation"; so as to read:

That the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company, a corporation created and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge across Black River, in the State of Louisiana, at such point suitable to the interests of navigation as may hereafter be selected by said railway company for crossing said river with its railroad line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 10, after the word "telegraph," to add "and telephone."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 2 the following proviso:

Provided, That the bridge herein authorized to be constructed shall be so kept and managed by the company owning or operating it as to afford proper ways and means for the passage through or under it of vessels, barges, or rafts at all times, both by day and by night; and there shall be displayed on said bridge, from sunset to sunrise, such lights and signals as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 4 the following:

Or, in case of disagreement, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties in interest.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; or, in case of disagreement, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 7, after the word "location," to insert "prepared with reference to a known datum plane, upon prescribed scale, furnished by the engineer officer having supervision of said river," and in line 10, after the word "of," to strike out "1 mile" and insert "2 miles"; in line 11, after the word "and," to strike out "1 mile" and insert "2 miles"; so as to read:

That the bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of said bridge and a map of the location, prepared with reference to a known datum plane, upon prescribed scale, furnished by the Engineer officer having supervision of said river, and giving for the space of 2 miles above and 2 miles below the proposed location of the bridge the topography of the banks of the river, with shore lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army and Navy of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 325) to provide that United States railroad corporations shall, for purposes of jurisdiction, be deemed citizens of the respective States into which their line of railway may extend;

A bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted;

A bill (H. R. 2178) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to taking depositions de bene esse;

A bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. 4554) to amend an act approved February 18, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891";

A bill (H. R. 4580) to amend section 3449 of the Revised Statutes;

A bill (H. R. 5379) making it unlawful to shoot at or into any railway locomotive or car, or at any person thereon, or to throw any rock or other missile at or into any locomotive or car, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 6345) to establish a criminal jurisdiction over places ceded to the United States for such purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter;

A bill (H. R. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes";

A bill (S. 2251) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River;

A bill (S. 2419) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona; and

A bill (H. R. 5286) providing for the disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath hay reservation not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon.

SUBJECT CATALOGUE OF BOOKS IN LAW LIBRARY.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. I should like the attention of the Senator from Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 69, and I should like, before it is read for information, to make a statement in a few words. It is a joint resolution authorizing the preparation of a subject catalogue of the books in the law library. It can not incur much expense for the first year. It will probably be the work of one clerk or two alone. It is greatly needed for the convenience not only of the court, but of members of both Houses of Congress. I desire to have the joint resolution now passed, so that it may be in order to move it as an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill when that bill comes up. I have no doubt it would have been passed the other day when the Senate was considering bills on the Calendar but for the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Library. It may be now read for information, and I should like to have it put on its passage.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 69) authorizing the preparation of a subject catalogue of the books in the law library, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be prepared, under the direction of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, by the law librarian, a compilation of the titles of all the books in the law library, classified alphabetically by legal subjects, arranged, indexed, and bound in suitable volumes, as a law-subject catalogue, for the use of the standing committees of the two Houses of Congress, the members of the two Houses, and the judges of the Supreme Court; and the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be found necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the preparation of said work, which sum may be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the order of the Chief Justice as additional pay or compensation to any officer or employee of the United States.

SEC. 2. That said catalogue be stereotyped and printed for sale to the public at a price equal to the cost of the paper, presswork, and binding, with 10 per cent added thereto, the proceeds of such sales to be paid into the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to object to the joint resolution at all, but it seems to me that the amount of $30,000 proposed is too large a sum to provide an index for the volumes in the law library.

Mr. HOAR. That sum was fixed by the Library Committee, I believe, on consultation with the librarian, but I would just as lief have it $10,000 as $30,000, because, of course, the whole amount proposed will not be expended in one year, and the additional appropriation can be made later. I have no choice about it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts how many volumes there are in the law library.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that there are about 100,000. It is the largest law library in the country, and I think in the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ten thousand dollars or $5,000 would be enough to commence with.

Mr. HOAR. It makes no difference, so far as I am concerned, whether the whole amount is appropriated this year or not.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that it is not to be an ordinary catalogue. It is to be a subject index, which it is expensive to make, but which, when made, is invaluable.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the money is to be expended under the direction of the Chief Justice of the United States, who certainly can be trusted with its expenditure. I will agree to reduce the amount to $20,000 or $15,000, if Senators prefer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it should not be more than $10,000.

Mr. HOAR. Make it $15,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that not more than $5,000 or $10,000 would be expended in the first year.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me that even $15,000 is an immense sum of money to appropriate for a catalogue.

Mr. HOAR. I would as lief just get it fairly started, and then I am sure the Committee on Appropriations will take care of it in future years. I will agree to reducing the amount appropriated to $10,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think that over $5,000 is needed this year.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, yes; that is a very small amount.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course it is a small amount; but it is not very small, either, when compared with the work that is to be done.

Mr. HOAR. It is to be a great subject catalogue, as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, of certainly one of the finest law libraries in the world—I am not sure that it is better than Lincoln's Inn. At any rate the work must be done by competent and able lawyers. It is to be done under the supervision of the Chief Justice of the United States, and the estimates coming from some source of the cost is $30,000. I think $5,000 is too small a sum, and I hope Senators will agree to make it $10,000. I move to reduce the amount from $30,000 to $10,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be modified as indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Is this a joint resolution that has come from the other House?

Mr. HOAR. No; it is a Senate resolution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I remember aright, this is a measure which has been before the Senate again and again for a number of years, is it not?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I remember when I was upon the Committee on the Library, the same measure was before the Senate and was very much pressed by some young man in connection with the library, who had prepared something in connection with this work. I know at that time it was not deemed expedient in the Library Committee to press it. I remember at that time this clerk of the library was upon the floor of the Senate explaining to Senators the measure, which represented some work of his own, which was to be adopted by Congress. I have the greatest deference to the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the character of the work, and if he has investigated it thoroughly I shall not object. I remember when I was upon the Committee on the Library we looked into it and it seemed to us as if it was more for private benefit than for public good.

Mr. HOAR. It does not put one dollar, as I understand it, in the pocket of any clerk or anybody else. It is a work which will be done either by the persons in the law library and on their salary, and they will get no pay for it otherwise, or by such other instrumentalities as the Chief Justice of the United States may direct. Can any Senator hesitate for a moment in the belief that a subject law catalogue, where you can find what you want instantly and by subject, is needed for the convenience of this body, to say nothing of the courts, to say nothing of the other House, or of the profession? This work is to be sold to the profession and to other libraries when it comes out. The necessity for it is apparent, and the character of the illustrious magistrate who will have charge of the work seems to me to make it altogether perfectly safe. I have not seen the person whom the Senator from Colorado speaks of for a year or two.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There is a little further question I should like to ask. There are a number of law libraries in the United States of greater or less magnitude. There is hardly a city in the United States which has not one. There is hardly a county seat which has not one. There is no place where a Federal court meets which has not one. Many cities have several. If it be true that a subject index is a matter of great benefit and advantage it is equally true that to the extent of the volumes which are generally held throughout the United States it would be fully as advantageous to every law library in the United States if it had a subject index. We have the most enterprising lot of law publishers in the world within the United States. If this were a volume which was to be of general advantage we would long since have had it compiled and prepared and put on sale for the benefit of the different law libraries of the United States.

The law library which we have here is far larger if the number of volumes be 100,000 than any other in the United States, and many of its volumes must be old and worthless lumber. There are not 100,000 law books that can by any possibility be of advantage to the lawyers in the preparation of their cases. The index by subjects of thousands and thousands of those volumes must be utterly useless and of no benefit to anybody. It does seem to me that the Judiciary Committee or some committee who are actively concerned in the contents of those books and their codification should go through this measure and examine it and make some investigation as to the needs of the library for such a catalogue before we take up the joint resolution for passage and make a large appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I shall have to object to the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say one word, if the Senator from Illinois will allow me.

Mr. CULLOM. I will allow that, of course.

Mr. WOLCOTT. First, one word as to the Chief Justice. Of course nobody doubts for a moment that if the Chief Justice of the United States out of the multitude of his duties will pay any attention to this matter it will be done not only with the utmost integrity, but intelligence and care. There is not the slightest reflection, as the Senator from Massachusetts understands perfectly, upon the Chief Justice of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I had not suggested any such thing.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; but the Senator had spoken once or twice of the fact that the work would be under the charge of the Chief Justice.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly I spoke of that, and of the security and safety of it.

Mr. President, a subject catalogue of a library like the law library is not a book to be largely sold. No matter how much it may be needed, in the nature of the case it is not a book which will be paid for like a form book or a treatise on some ordinary branch of the law, and if it is ever done for the country it has got to be done in this way and under the auspices of Congress. This seems to me to be the most economical way to do it.

In regard to what the Senator from Colorado says about the fact that many law books are useless lumber and that it is not desirable to have it known what they contain, I beg leave, with great respect, to differ from him. I think the experience of most persons who have had occasion to consult libraries as a matter of habit of life, as students or scholars, will warrant me in saying that it is astonishing how few of the vast number of books that are published on any subject are unnecessary for the investigation of scholars. When they were enlarging the library at Harvard, which is still, I believe, the foremost library in this country in value, if not now in number of volumes, in order to get the space they sent to another of the college buildings the books that the librarian thought would by no possibility ever have to be consulted by anyone. They seemed to be the merest old songs of books. But it was found that they had to send about ten times a week for books that were taken out of that library. I was in the library myself one morning, and the librarian told me they had sent over eight times to this collection of books that somebody or other had to look up.

Now, take a question of law, a turning point on which perhaps some great historic or constitutional question may be determined, or some great question before the Supreme Court of the United States which involves an important private interest, and you find it occurred to some one jurist and it has been dealt with in the judgment of some obscure court, and you get the necessary light upon it there. I remember once myself being counsel in a cause of very great interest and importance, for which no authority was found by the counsel on either side. After great study, Mr. Justice Metcalf, an old black-letter lawyer, dug into a volume of Chipman's Reports, or some volume of reports almost forgotten, and found the precise authority for the purpose. Now, I do not want to press the joint resolution unduly. The Senator from Colorado, a man of large learning and great genius and intellectual power, sees everything at a glance and settles everything by his intellectual capacity, as we all know. He may not need these helps that humbler intellects and humbler men need.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, Mr. President, I hope we will proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me ask first whether the joint resolution has passed from the consideration——

Mr. CULLOM. It has not passed, and I am inclined to think it ought not to be passed until the Committee on the Judiciary investigate the question.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. CULLOM. I objected to the further consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that objection was interposed to the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will reply to the Senator from Illinois some other day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over under the rule.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 325) to provide that United States railroad corporations shall for purposes of jurisdiction be deemed citizens of the respective States into which their line of railway may extend;

A bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted;

A bill (H. R. 2178) to amend section 864 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to taking depositions de bene esse;

A bill (H. R. 4554) to amend an act approved February 18, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891";

A bill (H. R. 5379) making it unlawful to shoot at or into any railway locomotive or car, or at any person thereon, or to throw any rock or other missile at or into any locomotive or car, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 6345) to establish a criminal jurisdiction over places ceded to the United States for such purposes.

The following bill and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 85) relative to the medal of honor authorized by the acts of July 12, 1862, and March 3, 1863.

The bill (H. R. 4580) to amend section 3449 of the Revised Statutes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] is entitled to recognition.

Mr. CANNON. When the Senate adjourned last evening it had under consideration a proposed amendment which I will ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, on page 96, it is proposed to strike out "five" before "thousand" and insert "seven"; and in line 25, to strike out "seven" before "thousand" and insert "nine"; so as to read:

For surveyor-general of the State of Utah, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $7,000; in all, $9,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I have no desire to make any remarks on this proposed amendment further than to state that of the public domain of Utah there have been surveyed but 15,000,000 acres, and there remain yet for survey more than 38,000,000 acres. The necessity, therefore, to have a competent clerical force in the office of the surveyor-general in order to make up the field notes for the parties who are out surveying the public domain must be quite apparent to all Senators present.

Mr. CULLOM. I make no opposition to the amendment, as it comes within the estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to a matter in behalf of my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY], who is detained from the Senate by illness, and who wishes me to propose an amendment for him in his absence. On page 4, line 6, after the word "dollars," I move to insert "assistant clerk, $1,440"; so as to read:

Clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,440.

As my colleague is absent and can not speak for himself, I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow the amendment to come in tentatively at least, and it can be looked into afterwards.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand that that committee has a vast amount of business.

Mr. PLATT. It has about 600 bills before it.

Mr. CULLOM. I am only sorry that they do not get more of them out of the committee. I am satisfied that there is need of an additional clerk there, and I will make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. While I am upon the floor, I ask to refer to page 31, the last line of the page, where, in the items for the Office of Auditor for the Treasury Department, it reads "ten clerks of class 2." That the Secretary of the Treasury is very solicitous about, and the number was reduced, I think, by mistake. I move, in line 25, on page 31, to strike out "ten" and insert "eleven"; so as to read:

Eleven clerks of class 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Then upon the next page, in line 4, page 32, the total should be changed. I move to strike out "$116,400" and insert "$117,800."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I now ask the attention of the Senate to the provisions beginning on page 115, section 5, relating to the marshals and district attorneys. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], representing the Judiciary Committee, will make some suggestions of amendment as we proceed with the reading of the items in the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Commencing on what page?

Mr. CULLOM. On page 115, at the bottom of the page, beginning with section 5.

Mr. TELLER. At the suggestion of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, I move, on page 115, line 24, after the word "that," to strike out "from" and insert "on"; in the same line, before the word "day," to strike out "thirtieth" and insert "first," and after the words "day of," to strike out "June" and insert "July."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 115, in section [7] 5, line 24, after the word "that," it is proposed to strike out "from" and insert "on"; before the word "day," in the same line, to strike out "thirtieth" and insert "first," and after the words "day of" to strike out "June" and insert "July"; so as to read:

That on and after the 1st day of July, 1896, all fees and emoluments, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. These provisions have not been regularly read by the Secretary.

Mr. TELLER. Then let the Secretary read them.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. [7] 5. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1896, all fees and emoluments authorized by law to be paid to United States district attorneys and United States marshals shall be charged as heretofore, and shall be collected, as far as possible, and paid to the clerk of the court having jurisdiction, and by him covered into the Treasury of the United States; and said officers shall be paid for their official services, salaries, and compensation hereinafter provided and not otherwise: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to require fees to be charged against or collected from the United States, except as provided by sections 12 and 14 of this act relating to field deputies and their payments.

Mr. HOAR. At this point in the consideration of the bill, I wish to say that I have desired to do what I could to make the bill, so far as it affects district attorneys and marshals, represent what I believe to be the desire of the Senate, and also to do what I think is for the public advantage. I am prepared, therefore, to do what I can in completing the text of the bill with that view, but I am opposed to adopting this important legislation on an appropriation bill. I think the Senate must feel that if they go into the question of legislating upon this subject it will be at a great disadvantage. If the House of Representatives refuse to concur with our amendments, we shall then have to insist on what we think is just and in the public interest at the cost possibly of defeating the appropriation bill, and legislating, as it were, with a loaded pistol at our temples. The result may be that we shall amend this bill according to what we think is for the public interest; then it will go into conference; there will be a disagreement; and then may come a proposition to adjourn Congress. When we get into the neighborhood of the time of adjournment, our conferees will come back and say to us that we must yield on this or the appropriation bill will fail, and there will be an extra session or we must prolong the session of Congress still further. I think the objection to legislating on subjects however important on an appropriation bill is very serious and grave indeed. It would then be very difficult to go back to this matter in the ordinary method of legislation. If the Senate and the House wish to correct the judicial system, they had better change the Constitution and abolish one or the other branch, or have some other Constitution.

So I wish to reserve the right to vote to strike out the whole thing, although I think the reform which is proposed in regard to these officers a very important one and one that ought to be accomplished.

Mr. CULLOM. Before proceeding further with these paragraphs, I will say that I neglected to ask the Senate to change the totals after an additional clerk was provided for on page 5. The total on that page, in lines 2 and 3, ought to be "$90,480" instead of the sum specified in the bill. I hope that change will be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 3, in the appropriations for "clerks and messengers to committees of the Senate," it is proposed to increase the total appropriation from "$93,040" to "$94,480."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as the members of the Committee on Appropriations were concerned, I think there was a feeling that, while it was a very great and serious step to add so much legislation to an appropriation bill, yet there seemed to be such a universal demand in favor of a change of the system in reference to the payment of marshals and district attorneys, that the Committee on Appropriations did not feel that they could afford to oppose such attempted legislation. The fact has been that there have been bills in the Judiciary Committees during several Congresses proposing to change the law in relation to the payment of these officers from fees to salaries, and it has been shown over and over again that there were great abuses under the present system, that the administration of our courts was becoming outrageously expensive to the country, and that some change should be made. The body where this bill originated was very earnest in its efforts to make such a change. The bill came to the Senate with these provisions upon it, and the Appropriations Committee did not feel that it could afford to refuse to consider them. As I have intimated already, the subject was referred to the Judiciary Committee for consideration and for the guidance of the action of the Appropriations Committee. What is now proposed to be acted upon by the Senate is a report from the Judiciary Committee made to the Committee on Appropriations. While I deprecate this kind of legislation generally, I do not feel, as a member of the committee, like opposing it in this instance.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his judgment, these sections, if added, would be a violation of Rule XVI of the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. They come from the other body as legislation already enacted by that body.

Mr. KYLE. There is a similar rule in the other House, I understand.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes. I do not undertake to pass upon the question whether it is a violation of the rules of the Senate or not.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to understand from the Senator whether he thinks it is general legislation or a change of existing law?

Mr. CULLOM. I think it is.

Mr. KYLE. That is all I wish to know.

Mr. CULLOM. That is my judgment; but I shall not discuss that any further. I hope the reading of the bill will proceed and that the Senator from Colorado will suggest the amendments as heretofore agreed upon.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to amend the bill?

Mr. TELLER. That is what I intended to do on behalf of the committee.

Mr. HILL. I wish to say something upon the subject suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the Senator had better wait until we get the bill amended, and then the whole subject will be before the Senate.

Mr. HILL. That will be just as well.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to have an understanding while we are dealing with this paragraph, after the Committee on Appropriations has moved its amendments, that other amendments may be moved to the paragraph without postponing the whole subject to the end of the bill. It will be more convenient, certainly, to attend to the whole matter at once. There are some amendments which the Committee on the Judiciary wish to propose.

Mr. TELLER. I have no control over that.

Mr. HOAR. I am asking consent.

Mr. TELLER. I am proposing the amendments suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to think, if it be agreeable to the Senate, that as these items are reached whatever amendments are to be proposed may as well be offered at the time, item by item, so that we may get rid of the subject as we go along.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope no agreement will be reached that will prevent us from moving to strike out all of these sections.

Mr. CULLOM. That can be done after the sections have been amended.

Mr. PLATT. That can be done in the Senate in any event.

Mr. SHERMAN. I may desire to submit such a motion.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent, after the Committee on Appropriations have moved their amendments to these two sections, that other amendments may be in order without waiting until the completion of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose that will be done. I do not object.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is proposing the amendments as from the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, these amendments formally and nominally come from the Committee on Appropriations, but they are, as I understand, amendments which were presented to the Committee on Appropriations by the Judiciary Committee, and we did not undertake to revise them.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, let me state just what was done. After the Committee on Appropriations had determined not to strike these provisions out of the bill, which personally I very much regret, the whole question of marshals and district attorneys was referred to the Judiciary Committee. That committee has made a report to the Appropriations Committee, which was found to have some mistakes in it. Then the Judiciary Committee reexamined the question, and I am presenting what I understand to be the second report, which did not reach the Appropriations Committee until after that committee had reported the bill to the Senate.

It was found that the Judiciary Committee—I am a member of both committees—had made some mistake, we had some lack of information, and now these amendments are being proposed for the purpose of trying to secure an equitable and just arrangement of the salaries both of marshals and district attorneys in accordance with the amount of business they have to do.

I will say that the Attorney-General was before both the Appropriations Committee and the Judiciary Committee on this subject, and gave his opinion as to some of the proposed changes, and we reported in accordance with that.

I also have a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury about some of the proposed changes, which I desire to move now, which are not of any great consequence. Agreeably to the suggestion of the Comptroller, who consulted the Attorney-General, who also desires the insertion made, on page 116, in section [7] 5, after the word "services," in line 6, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section [7] 5, on page 116, line 6, after the word "services," it is proposed to insert "which, in the case of district attorneys, shall include services in the circuit courts of appeals of their respective circuits wherever sitting."

Mr. ALLEN. Let me ask the Senator if he will not move to insert those words after the word "salaries," in the same line, instead of after the word "services"?

Mr. PLATT. I do not think it makes good sense.

Mr. ALLEN. It does not make good sense as it is now.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment is offered for the purpose of making it clear that the services are to be rendered in the circuit courts of appeals.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says that my suggestion will not make good sense.

Mr. PLATT. No; I say I do not think the amendment as reported at the Secretary's desk makes good sense.

Mr. ALLEN. It does not make good sense as reported now.

Mr. PLATT. That is what I have said. Let the amendment be again stated.

The SECRETARY. In section [7] 5, on page 116, line 6, after the word "services," it is proposed to insert "which, in the case of district attorneys, shall include services in the circuit courts of appeals of their respective circuit courts wherever sitting"; so as to read:

And said officers shall be paid for their official services, which, in the case of district attorneys, shall include services in the circuit courts of appeals of their respective circuits wherever sitting, salaries and compensation hereinafter provided, and not otherwise.

Mr. PLATT. The sense is all right.

Mr. TELLER. That is the point where the amendment should come in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. In line 8 of the same section, after the word "require," I move to insert "or authorize"; so as to read:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to require or authorize fees to be charged against or collected from the United States, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. In line 10 of the same section, in order to correct the numbers of the sections referred to, I move to strike out "12," where it occurs and insert "10," and to strike out "14" and insert "12."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section [7] 5, on page 116, line 10, after the word "sections," it is proposed to strike out "12," and insert "10," and before the words "of this act," to strike out "14" and insert "12"; so as to read "except as provided in sections 10 and 12 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I shall try to follow with the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee which did not reach the Appropriations Committee in time to be considered by that committee.

Mr. VILAS. Has section 6 been read?

Mr. CULLOM. It has not.

Mr. TELLER. The section should be read.

Mr. VILAS. I think as it is read the Senator might propose his amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The section will be read and the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations acted upon as they are reached in the reading, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read section [8] 6. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 5, after the word "each," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

SEC. 6. That the United States district attorney for each of the following judicial districts of the United States shall be paid an annual salary as follows: For the northern and middle districts of the State of Alabama, each $5,000, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 16, after the word "Alabama," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the southern district of Alabama, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 20, after the word "California," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the northern district of California, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

For the southern district of California, $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out "three" and insert "four."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section [8] 6, on page 116, line 22, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the southern district of California, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the section was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 22, after the word "Colorado," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the district of Colorado, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like the Senator from Colorado to state why these salaries should be increased over the amount fixed by the House of Representatives?

Mr. TELLER. I will say that these salaries were fixed by the Judiciary Committee. I wish to say to the Senator that personally I think they are in many instances very much too high, and I suppose it is likely when they come out of conference they will be very much lower.

Mr. ALLEN. I want it understood at this time that I reserve the right to object to all these items of increase of salary of United States district attorneys and marshals after the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I understand every Senator has that right.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand, the Judiciary Committee has been keeping below, and never proposing to raise salaries at all, never going above what the particular district attorney or the marshal has earned, except in one or two very extraordinary cases. The Judiciary Committee have desired largely to be governed by the opinion of the Senator from Colorado and by the opinion of the Senator from the particular State in which the district is situated; and in this particular instance we should not have proposed an increase if the Senators from Colorado thought the salary too high for that State. I should for one, if they so thought, have assented to reducing it.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, understands very well upon what theory the committee proceeded. It was that the salary should be uniform according to the services rendered, or to be rendered; and if other items are to be put up in this way, Colorado is entitled to be put up also.

The House of Representatives have not, in my judgment, provided a very equitable arrangement here. Some of the salaries are entirely too high and some too low. We undertook to equalize them and make the provision just and equitable. That will not, I think, perhaps, prevent the scaling down of a percentage of them. I should be quite willing, so far as Colorado is concerned, if other salaries are put down, that the salaries should be put down for the officers in that State; but I am not willing that an officer in an adjoining State who does less work should have more salary than an officer in my State who does much more.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to a fact that may or may not have attracted the attention of the Judiciary Committee. We are now considering the southern district of California, as I understand.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. TELLER. Colorado.

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly Colorado, which makes it so much the worse. I hold in my hand an official communication as to the mileage of the several attorneys of the United States for the last six months; and I find that Mr. H. V. Johnson, of Colorado, drew for the last six months $760.20 mileage; which for the year would make $1,520.40. Under the ruling of the Supreme Court, Mr. Johnson is not required to make any account, or is not chargeable with this mileage. I find with reference to others that the mileage has been nothing in some instances; in others it has not exceeded $50 a year; and in a great many others it was less than $100. If Mr. Johnson is to be put upon an equality with those who receive a small compensation for their traveling expenses, would it not be wise for the Judiciary Committee—a committee which I hope is committed to the great doctrine of economy in these peculiar times—to take that into account, and reduce his salary to some extent at least?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that Mr. Johnson has to travel a long distance. He has three courts to attend, two of which are away from the point of his residence, and he is compelled to make long journeys. He would not be required to travel so far in many of the States, because they are not big enough. He travels in order to reach the most distant court he is required to attend nearly as far, I suppose, as from here to Philadelphia, or farther. There is only one district in Colorado.

Mr. PLATT. All these traveling expenses have to be paid in the first instance out of his own pocket, and he gets them back.

Mr. TELLER. He has to pay them first out of his own pocket.

Mr. ALLEN. I call attention to the fact that his traveling expenses are paid by the Government.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; but he has to pay them in the first instance, and then they are paid back to him by the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. He has first to pay them, but he charges the Government 10 cents a mile for riding on the cars, when the rates are about 3 cents.

Mr. TELLER. He will not under this bill.

Mr. HOAR. That is abolished.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad of it. I was not aware of the fact that it had been abolished, and I fail to see any provision abolishing it.

Mr. TELLER. We provide that every man shall get a salary, and then he will pay his own expenses, only being allowed his actual traveling expenses.

Mr. ALLEN. I call the attention of the Senator to this inequality to a little greater extent in the northern district of Alabama. The traveling fees of the district attorney for the last six months have been $133.20; of the middle district, $80; of the southern district, $93.80—a State as large as the State of Colorado, practically—and all put together the fees do not amount to one-half of the traveling expenses of Mr. Johnson in the State of Colorado. In the eastern district of Arkansas it was $56; in the western district nothing; in the northern district of California nothing; in the southern district $190.60.

Mr. TELLER. I can not explain all the inaccuracies of the system now in existence. What we are trying to do is to get rid of a system which allows such things to be done.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me one-half minute, I will say that, as I understand, under the present existing law the evils which the Senator from Nebraska points out exist; that is, officials get so much a mile, 10 cents a mile, I think. If they have a free pass on the railroads, the 10 cents a mile, if they happen to travel 250 miles to convey a prisoner, or to summon a witness in a case of larceny, or perform some other official duty, is clear gain.

Mr. ALLEN. Clear gain?

Mr. HOAR. Yes. It is so far an abuse unless all that they get is not sufficient to pay them. Then, of course, it is not an abuse. Under this bill I said that system is abolished. I meant by what I said just now that it is proposed to be abolished by this bill. This bill provides a salary for those officials and that they shall get their actual traveling expenses; that is, what they actually pay out. If they travel on a free pass they do not get their fare back. If they pay out 2 cents a mile or 3 cents a mile for railroad fare, that they get back actually, and I suppose nobody would doubt that that should be done. So I suppose this bill cures that difficulty.

The difference in the existence of such fees and charges in different districts arises somewhat from the character of the business. For instance, you take some moonshiner districts, as they are called, where the deputy marshals may have to go into a district at a distance from the court-house to summon witnesses. They charge fees, and a great mass of those are piled up. In some cases, undoubtedly, some small offenses are complained of or are almost invented in order to make business for the United States commissioners and deputy marshals; but that is all proposed to be cured by this bill.

In other districts, where there is a great deal more actual law business done, there is very little opportunity for collecting fees and emoluments, when in fact there is a great deal more actual public service rendered.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Colorado to point out that feature in this bill which cures the case he mentions.

Mr. PLATT. It is on page 120, I think.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Nebraska will look at the bill and let us go on he can raise those questions later. It seems to me that would be the better way.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is the proviso beginning in line 4, page 120.

Mr. HOAR. It begins on page 115.

Mr. PLATT. The provision on page 116 reads:

Said officers shall be paid for their official services salaries and compensation hereinafter provided, and not otherwise.

The paragraph on page 120 relates to traveling expenses.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 22, page 116, after the word "Colorado," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the district of Colorado, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 23, page 116, after the word "Connecticut," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; so as to read:

For the district of Connecticut, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 25, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Delaware, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 25, page 116, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for the District of Columbia, $5,000; for the northern and southern districts of Florida, each $3,000," and insert:

For the northern district of Florida, $3,500; for the southern district of Florida, $4,000.

Mr. PASCO. I ask to have the amendment modified in line 3, on page 117, by changing "$3,500" to "$4,000." I have already spoken to the Senator from Colorado with reference to it.

Mr. TELLER. Let that be done.

Mr. PASCO. I have demonstrated the fact that this is a proper allowance for that office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, page 117, after the word "Florida," it is proposed to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand"; so as to read:

For the northern district of Florida, $4,000; for the southern district of Florida, $4,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 117, line 6, after the word "Georgia," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000"; so as to read:

For the southern district of Georgia, $3,000.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] called my attention and that of the members of the Judiciary Committee to the fact that the compensation in the second district of Georgia should be the same as in the first. There is really more business in the southern district. I hope the Senator will move an amendment to make it $5,000.

Mr. BACON. In accordance with the recommendation which, as I understand, has been made by the Judiciary Committee, I move that the amount for the marshal of the southern district of Georgia be fixed at $5,000. I move to amend the amendment so as to make it $5,000 instead of $2,500.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I referred to. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] made such a motion in the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BACON. I move, in line 6, page 117, to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. VEST. It is $3,000 in the bill.

Mr. BACON. That is the amendment reported by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, page 117, it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$5,000"; so as to read:

For the southern district of Georgia, $5,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I do not like to interfere with this pleasant arrangement of increasing salaries, but I feel very much like the Senator from Colorado did a moment ago when he stated that if a man in an adjoining State is going to get a large salary for doing less work than a similar officer in his own State gets he would ask for an increase; and so I will ask the Senate when it reaches my State to increase the item, too; and I am not disposed to do that.

In regard to several items in the bill, I have in my hand the report of the Auditor for the State and other Departments to the Secretary of the Treasury, wherein you will find the official figures showing the exact amount which each of the marshals and each of the district attorneys charged up and was paid last year; and it is the only place you can find it.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from South Carolina will wait until South Carolina is reached I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is now asking that the Senate shall raise the salary of the district attorney for the southern district of Georgia to $5,000 from $3,000, at which the Senate committee has placed it, and $2,500 at which the other House fixed it, thereby doubling his compensation.

I am not trying to oppose anybody. I am merely endeavoring to call attention to the fact that we are padding the bill and trying to stop the other House in its efforts to uproot the abuses growing out of the fee system. We are putting so much on these provisions that we will load them down and they will be killed, and we ought not to do that.

I will call attention to some items here. The marshal of the southern district of Georgia is placed in this report, which is official, as having earned in fees $13,122.90. The district attorney earned only $2,850.60, and therefore he got all the fees that were coming to him. In other words, he got every single dollar that he could charge.

If you will look on down you will come to New Hampshire, for instance. The marshal earned only $1,227 and the district attorney earned only $712, and yet you will find here that he is going to get $3,000. In other words, you are going to raise the salary of an officer who receives only $712 to $2,500 or $3,000, I do not remember which it is; I know it has been largely increased.

I give notice, if you are going to make increases as to other districts, when we come to South Carolina, I shall merely ask that we shall have some of the pie, too.

I am willing to vote to stand by the House report, or I will stand by the Senate report as it has come in; but if we are going to continue to increase salaries because one man is trying to help out his constituent and wants to increase his salary, I say, as a matter of justice, that the thing ought to go around.

Mr. BACON. I desire to state that neither my colleague nor myself has received any communication whatever from the district attorney of the southern district of Georgia, and that the motion which I made to amend the amendment was made exclusively in view of the fact that the Judiciary Committee, which has had the matter under consideration, has so recommended.

I think the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has much pertinency in it, and in view of the state of facts set forth in this report, that the district attorney for the southern district of Georgia does not earn exceeding the amount recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and upon consultation with my colleague, I will withdraw the amendment and ask that the clause may stand as reported by the committee, allowing $3,000 for the district attorney for the southern district of Georgia.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make one observation before the Senator from Georgia withdraws his amendment, if I may be permitted.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The reports of earnings, of course, in some districts are all the information we have except what we get from individual Senators, who know the needs and condition of their States. But they are a very uncertain guide. Take, for instance, a port like Savannah, or a port like Mobile, in Alabama, or New Orleans or Boston, where they have admiralty causes, where in time of war they have prize causes, where the United States district attorney may have to deal with delicate questions affecting our international relations, and you have to have, and you ought to have, in such a port a man at the constant call of the Government whose learning, character, and capacity entitle him to be treated as a first-class lawyer. All over the United States, taking our history clear back to the beginning, we have in general had great lawyers at the service of the United States.

Now, there may be in time of peace, when there are no prize causes, an important indictment, an indictment, for instance, for wrecking a vessel to get the insurance, or for barratry, or an indictment under our revenue laws, or other important indictments, where the district attorney may be employed for a fortnight or three weeks in one trial, and where, if he charged according to the rates that private parties pay, he would charge more than his whole salary. Still that goes into his earnings or emoluments as $10 if he loses the case and $50 if he wins it. That is three weeks' work.

On the other hand, in some other part of the country a lot of small cases may be got up against Indians for selling liquor or against moonshiners or on account of some small smuggling operation, where the witnesses will be summoned by the marshal to travel a hundred miles to court or where the district attorney himself will have to travel to the place of hearing before a commissioner, and there will be five hundred or a thousand dollars of fees returned in the account when all those cases put together do not represent one-quarter either of the professional labor or of the professional capacity which the man in Savannah or Mobile has put into a single case.

So that the Committee on the Judiciary, having before them the emoluments and seeing what they were and so on, were obliged to trust largely to the judgment of the Senators from the different districts as to what their officials should receive. The amendment which is prepared and which is ready to be moved for South Carolina, which is the one suggested by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and which I hope he will himself move, would put the South Carolina district on precisely the same footing with that in Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The action which I took in the first instance was, as I stated, based exclusively on the judgment of the Judiciary Committee. I did not know the considerations which had moved them to that recommendation. The reasons given by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I think, are entirely controlling. I have within my personal knowledge had illustration of the truth of the condition of affairs as stated by the distinguished Senator. I have known in that particular district an instance where the district attorney was engaged for thirty-one days in the representation of the Government in the prosecution of a single case. For that he received no larger fee than if the case had not consumed more than one hour.

Mr. HOAR. That is it exactly.

Mr. BACON. I think the judgment of the Judiciary Committee, as explained by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, is one which ought to be sustained by the Senate, and after consultation with my colleague, I renew the amendment and shall ask the Senate to adopt it.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, page 117, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "three thousand" and inserting "five thousand"; so as to read:

For the southern district of Georgia, $5,000.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to call attention briefly to some of the inequalities of the action of the Judiciary Committee and the Appropriations Committee. For the last fiscal year the United States district attorney for the northern district of Georgia received $7,959 besides his mileage, which amounted to $256.70. The district attorney for the southern district of Georgia received $3,056 in the form of fees rather, and he received $256.70 mileage. The proposition of the Judiciary Committee is to increase that salary from $3,056 as it existed last year to $5,000, making it practically $2,000 above the earnings of that office last year.

Now, I wish in this connection to call attention to some other matters, and it will save the necessity of doing it at another time. Take, for instance, the northern district of California, which is fixed at $5,000 by the committee. The United States district attorney received last year in fees $1,947, and here is an increase of over $3,000 in that case. If we are to indulge in economy in the passage of the pending appropriation bill, it occurs to me that we have started in the wrong direction.

Take the southern district of California, for instance. Under the amendment as proposed by the committee $3,000 is to be allowed for the southern district of California. Last year the fees amounted to $2,900. The committee proposes to allow $5,000 in a case where the fees were $1,947 and $3,000 in a district where the fees were $2,900.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me? I think he is mistaken in thinking that the amount of fees should be the ultimate criterion as to the amount of salary in every case.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I am, too.

Mr. VEST. I will tell the Senator why, and of course as a lawyer he will appreciate it.

Take a district attorney in a district where there are large cities, or one large city, and he has under his charge very important litigation for which he gets about the same fees as he would for a small case. Take the city of New York, the city of Savannah, Ga., which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has mentioned here, or Charleston, or New Orleans, or the city of St. Louis, or any of the large cities, and there are very important cases in which the Government is interested, and a great amount of work is required to be done by the district attorney, for which he receives about the same fee that he does for an inconsiderable case.

I have had some experience in this matter for about twelve years with the Attorneys-General and with deputy attorneys-general, and I have found it one of the most difficult tasks that can be given to mortal man. I do not care what sort of a bill you bring in here, you will have the same sort of thing that is going on here now. One Senator thinks that because fees are shown to be less in another district than in a district in his State he is entitled to an increase.

You can not establish any iron rule in regard to the matter. You must take each district and determine as to the amount that is justly due for the services rendered. That is the only way in which it can be done. I do not like the legislation that is put in this bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] once said in regard to a tariff bill that he never had voted for a tariff bill that suited him. I never expect to find a tariff bill, or a river and harbor bill, or a bill of this kind which meets my entire approbation, and in which, in my opinion, there are not defects. But all legislation is in the nature of compromise. A tariff bill, a river and harbor bill, a bill fixing fees and salaries constitute the most difficult legislation in the world, because they bring up what you might call the entire representative feature of our Constitution.

Mr. ALLEN. There seems to be a desire here to get all that is possible, and in that respect I agree with the Senator from Missouri.

It is quite evident to any person who will take the compensation that was paid to Federal attorneys for the last year and the amendments as they have been offered by the Judiciary Committee or by the Committee on Appropriations that the latter are largely in excess of the former. Instead of being a bill to equalize salaries and to put it beyond the power of district attorneys to prosecute for the sake of fees cases that ought not to be prosecuted, it has been deemed wise, and I deem it wise, to substitute the salary system in place of the fee system. The district attorney in the northern district of California—and I select that district because it is handy here—received but $1,947 for his services last year, and he presumably rendered the Government all services that were necessary. The House of Representatives fixed his compensation in the bill at $4,000, and it occurs to me that it is utterly reckless, to put it in mild terms, for the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Appropriations to propose to raise it to $5,000. The salary for the southern district of California is practically correct. The earnings were $2,900 last year. The other House fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate permits that sum to stand.

Take, for instance, the districts of Arkansas, the eastern and western districts, and there is a very large disparity between the receipts of the district attorneys of those districts last year. In the eastern district the district attorney received $5,419 and in the western district the attorney received $10,562, and the committee put those two districts upon a perfect equality, $4,000 each.

In the State of Florida, for instance, last year the United States attorney for the northern district received $4,439 in fees and the district attorney for the southern district received $3,244.

Mr. PASCO. That is for six months, as the Senator from Nebraska will see by reference to the official paper coming from the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not talking about the mileage. I am speaking with respect to the annual compensation.

Mr. PASCO. I know what the Senator is talking about.

Mr. ALLEN. Take, again, for instance, the State of Idaho. In the State of Idaho the district attorney received $2,390.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Nebraska does not understand the workings of the present system.

Mr. ALLEN. And no other man understands them.

Mr. DUBOIS. I understand them, I dare say.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad of it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Having occupied one of those positions, I have had some practical experience.

The attorneys and marshals in the Western States make a great deal of money out of mileage. They get 10 cents a mile for travel. They get 10 cents a mile for transporting prisoners, and they make a great deal out of that, which does not appear in the emolument returns.

The district attorney in Idaho received $2,900, as it appears there, yet the attorney and the marshal make a great deal out of mileage, legitimately and honestly, which does not appear in the $2,900 which the Senator from Nebraska mentioned.

It is so in all of the Western States, where the distances are great. That is done away with in this bill. The marshal of Idaho makes a great deal more, I dare say, than $3,500. It will be a saving to the Government. The Senator from Nebraska does not seem to understand that they get the mileage outside of the emoluments that he is reading all the time.

Mr. ALLEN. I announced an hour ago that they got their mileage outside of the fees. Now, let us look at the question of mileage, too.

Mr. DUBOIS. That is eliminated by the pending bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Right here I have the figures: J. H. Forney, district attorney for the district of Idaho, for the last six months drew $1,212.10 mileage. In the State of Kentucky, a State almost as large, in population and litigation larger, and where the district attorney has to attend five terms of court, Mr. Smith received $67 for the same time.

Mr. President, if this system is so honest in the judgment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], I should like to have him explain how the district attorney in his State drew $1,212.10 for six months and the district attorney for the State of Kentucky, where the travel is as great and the business larger, drew only $67.

Mr. DUBOIS. That is very easily explained, Mr. President. The attorney for Idaho lives 1,000 miles from the court at Blackfoot. He lives at Moscow, which is 1,000 miles from Blackfoot. The distances are great. A man is arrested and brought before a commissioner's court seven or eight hundred miles away. The attorney goes there to attend. We have those districts, which are larger than in other States.

Mr. ALLEN. How much larger is the State of Idaho than the State of Kentucky?

Mr. DUBOIS. They do not have so many districts in Kentucky, probably.

Mr. ALLEN. The State of Idaho has but one judicial district. Mr. President, that disparity can not be explained.

Mr. DUBOIS. I insist that it is easily explained why there is such large mileage in Idaho. I can not explain, perhaps, why there is such small mileage in Kentucky, but it is perfectly natural and simple and can not be avoided in the Western States that the mileage shall be greater.

Mr. ALLEN. It seems, however, that it pays the district attorney to live a thousand miles away from the seat of litigation.

Mr. DUBOIS. He can not live at all three seats of litigation.

Mr. ALLEN. And he goes a thousand miles every time a little infraction of the Federal law comes up and is to be heard before a United States commissioner. Take, for instance, the northern district of Illinois. The mileage was but $31.40 in that district in the last six months.

Mr. BACON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that there is one element in this business which he has not taken into consideration. In all districts where the business justifies it, the law authorizes the appointment of an assistant attorney, and these fees represent what has been earned in the office by the work both of the principal and the assistants, whereas in other districts, where the fees appear to be much larger, the Government is at that much less expense, because there is simply the principal district attorney without an assistant. In my own State, for instance, we have two districts. The northern district of Georgia is one of the recognized moonshine districts, as they are called, where there is a very large amount of business and where as large fees are earned in a few hours in one day in the trial and disposition of cases of that kind as will be earned in another district where the business is of a different character, probably, in a week. But in one case there is simply the district attorney, and in the other case there is the district attorney and also an assistant, who has been appointed under the provisions of the law. So the Senator in considering the question as to the proportion of fees earned with the amount of salary proposed to be paid must take into consideration the fact that in the one case there is one officer, and in the other case there are two officers.

Mr. DUBOIS. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me for a moment, I had overlooked a very important fact. The law provides that the marshal and the attorney may accept actual expenses in lieu of mileage if it is so desired. Now, in and around Chicago, where railroad fare is cheap and living is cheap, they take their actual expenses, and probably they will do that——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Idaho shall explain away this matter if he can, but the explanation will have to be somewhat more lucid than it is now to satisfy me that he is correct.

I come now to a State of which I have some personal knowledge. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to this statement. In the northern district of Iowa for the last six months the mileage was $1,267.20, making a yearly mileage of almost $2,600. In the southern district of Iowa it was $412.60 for the same time. I personally know something about the State of Iowa. I went there forty years ago, and I know every foot of territory between the Mississippi and the Missouri rivers as well as a boy and man could know it by traveling over it in that time. I know personally that the travel in the northern district of Iowa is no greater than it is in the southern district. The truth is, that the courts are held in the northern district at but three places, and they are not as important courts as those held in the southern district, for the population is not as great and the business is not as great. Yet here is this disparity of Mr. Cato Sells, of the northern district, receiving $1,267.20 mileage for six months, making about $2,600 for the year, and Mr. C. D. Fullen, of the southern district, receiving for the same time $412.60. Will the Senator from Idaho say that there are some peculiar circumstances about that, accounting upon a basis of honesty for this disparity?

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know just why it is that the mileage in the northern district of Iowa is larger than the mileage in the southern district, unless it be that the district attorney in the southern district resides very near the places where the chief courts are held, namely, Keokuk and Des Moines—living midway between them.

Mr. ALLEN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that court is held at Council Bluffs also.

Mr. ALLISON. Court is also held there twice a year. In the northern district the district attorney resides at a distance from all the places of holding the court except Cedar Rapids. He resides near that point. So when he goes to Dubuque, where the principal business of the court is transacted, or to Sioux City, going to the one place he has a mileage account probably of 200 miles and in going to the other a little more than 200 miles. He charges mileage of course for every time he either attends the courts or attends other duties, like commissioners' courts and so on. If he is called either to Sioux City or Dubuque to a commissioner's hearing he charges mileage from his place of residence to the place where the commissioner is holding his court. So the argument the Senator from Nebraska is making and the illustrations which he produces here are to my mind the strongest arguments for dealing with this subject and dealing with it now.

The district attorneys for the northern and southern districts of Iowa receive each the maximum sum of $6,000 per annum for their services without including their mileage account. If it be true, as shown by the memorandum of the Senator from Nebraska, that the district attorney for the northern district of Iowa is receiving $2,600 mileage for six months' service it means that he is practically receiving twice that sum for a year's service, and in addition to that he will be entitled to receive, under the existing statute, the maximum sum of $6,000. So his compensation under existing law will amount to $11,000 per annum, whereas under the provisions of this new scheme his compensation will be $5,500 per annum, if the amendment of the Judiciary Committee is adopted, and his actual traveling expenses while he is on duty as respects the public business of the State.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion right there?

Mr. ALLISON. After I finish the sentence. And in addition to that, the Attorney-General is required by these provisions to declare where the official residence of the district attorney shall be.

Mr. HOAR. And there will be no expenses in traveling.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore there can be no expense in traveling to and from his official residence. If the Attorney-General does what I believe he will do, he will fix the official residence of the district attorney at the principal place where courts are held, and then the district attorney will be entitled to receive no compensation for expenses of traveling from a distant home to or from that official residence. So the arguments suggested by the Senator from Nebraska are strong arguments to my mind that we should deal at the present session of Congress, whether upon this bill or by a separate measure, with this question.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that there is another disparity as respects this clause.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Iowa does not understand that I antagonize the adoption of the salary system in lieu of the fee system.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I do not. I was only stating that the Senator from Nebraska is giving the strongest illustration, to my mind, why these provisions should be dealt with. He spoke of the disparity as respects the mileage between the State of Idaho and the State of Kentucky. The Senator will observe that under existing law the fees authorized to be charged in what are known as the mountain States are double fees under existing law, so that if the district attorney for the State of Idaho resides a thousand miles from where the court is held he is entitled to charge 20 cents per mile instead of 10. His mileage under the existing law is twice that of the interior States of the country.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to call his attention to a State that is not a mountain State. I call attention to the northern district of New York, where the mileage for the last six months has been $2,806.80.

Mr. PLATT. That is just what we are cutting off.

Mr. ALLISON. That only shows the possible abuses that may exist under the present law. I have no doubt the district attorney resides at a point remote from where the courts are held in the northern district of New York, and therefore charges mileage every time he leaves his home on public business, of course. As the Senator looks over these amendments, he will observe that we have retained the double-fee provision of the mountain States, but we have provided that the double fees in those States, as in other States, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the district attorneys and marshals in those States, like in every other State, will be entitled to receive only their actual traveling expenses and cost of living during the time they are traveling.

Mr. VILAS. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask the Senator from Iowa, while he is on his feet, a question? What is the occasion for so large a business by the district attorneys and marshals in the State of Iowa? It is an agricultural State, with no ports of entry, no Indian reservations, no special moonshining; none of those subjects that raise business in general.

Mr. PASCO. There are no wicked people in Iowa.

Mr. VILAS. And there are no wicked people in Iowa, as the Senator from Florida suggests.

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator as best I can. We have in Iowa a very intelligent, active, law-abiding population; we have also a minimum of those who trespass upon the laws.

Mr. GRAY. And they come over from Wisconsin, I suppose?

Mr. ALLISON. They come over from neighboring States. I shall not discriminate against Wisconsin at this moment, for I feel very friendly to that State. But we have there a semiprohibitory statute and we have also a United States statute which taxes the sale of intoxicating liquors. A good many people in Iowa are in the habit of undertaking to sell intoxicating liquors in violation of our statutes as well as in violation of the Federal statute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the rights of the unfinished business, such as they are, be protected by laying it temporarily aside, without losing its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside without losing its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the present law the marshals, the deputy marshals, the commissioners of the courts, the district attorneys, and you may add the clerks of the courts, derive their compensation and emoluments practically from fees. Therefore it is that through these officers and their deputies there is a remarkable vigilance in the enforcement of the laws in our State. Every time a person is guilty of an infraction of the law the whole corps of the United States courts, including, first, the deputy marshals, then the commissioner, then the district attorney or his assistant, then the clerk, the law requiring that there shall be a jury trial in these cases, which I think could very well be dispensed with and thus save enormous expenses; the whole machinery of the courts is brought to bear against a person who violates a single provision of the statute, costing I do not know how many hundreds of dollars in every case. It may be that many cases are practically compromised by a person pleading guilty and going through all the forms in order that the fees may be charged. It may be that there are a great many prosecutions, and I think there are a great many, which under the proposed change in the fee system would not appear in the courts.

Mr. GRAY. Then may I ask the Senator from Iowa if a change to the salary system might not change the character of his State from a semiprohibitory State to one much less than semiprohibitory?

Mr. ALLISON. That is getting into a fine analysis of the ultimate or immediate results of our laws that I do not care to discuss, although I believe that under this system the laws of the United States will be fairly enforced and at a minimum of cost compared with the existing conditions of things.

Now, what is true in these agricultural States (and I will interrupt the Senator from Nebraska only one moment more) is true in a larger degree in the mountain States, where it is of the utmost value to the people who can violate the liquor statutes as respects the manufacture of liquor. The question, it seems to me, after all, that we should consider is, what is the reasonable compensation of an attorney learned in the law who is capable of dealing with whatever question may come before the courts of the United States as respects our United States laws? I believe that competent attorneys can be found in nearly all the States of this Union who will perform these duties at a less rate than is proposed in the bill.

Mr. VILAS. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will allow me one observation more in reference to this matter.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Iowa has given substantially the answer I expected, that the large figure of emoluments from which the district attorney and marshal in each of the districts in Iowa is paid arises from a thorough cultivation of the business of those officers. We are now fixing the salary for the future, when that business probably will not be so well cultivated. Why is it that the salary should be raised in a State like Iowa, where there are two districts, above the amount which is fixed generally in the other States? It seems to me that it would be a great deal wiser if we fixed a maximum of $5,000 in every case, except perhaps such districts as New York, Boston, Chicago, New Orleans, San Francisco, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, where there is a large amount of customs business requiring peculiar abilities and much labor.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Nebraska will pardon me one moment further, I will make a suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin, who indulged in a slight implication that possibly the Judiciary Committee in its judgment of these salaries has been too liberal to the State which I in part represent, it being an agricultural State. As I understand it, the Judiciary Committee have made this schedule and scale of salaries upon what is known as the emolument returns of the last two or three years. They have supposed that the salary should approximate at least the amount that the district attorneys and marshals have received hitherto, and therefore turning to Iowa they saw the large emoluments, which do not even include mileage, and thus fixed Iowa, as they fixed other States, upon this basis. It is true, I think, that in great cities like New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and perhaps New Orleans and Chicago, where the cost of living is much higher than it is in rural localities, the fees and compensation of district attorneys should be larger, as a man who is fitted to perform the duties of district attorney in those great cities can of course in his private practice earn a much larger sum than even the maximum amount provided in the law.

Mr. VILAS. The business is much greater.

Mr. ALLISON. The business is much greater, but there has been an amendment offered—if not printed, it is proposed to be offered—providing that the services for which the salaries are paid shall not include services in customs cases. So I think there is some provision, or intent at least, among those who are dealing with this subject to exclude customs cases. I am not clear about that. In response to the Senator from Nebraska, and the Senator from Wisconsin as well, I will say that the State of Iowa, and those who represent it here, will be willing that there shall be such an adjustment of the compensation of district attorneys and marshals in that State as will only fairly do justice to those officers in that State as compared with those in other States.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, just a moment with reference to the State of Iowa, to which I referred for the sole purpose of comparison and as illustrating the disparity between the receipts of the two district attorneys. The bulk of the population in the State of Iowa is to be found in the southern district of Iowa. The great body of the important litigation in the State of Iowa, as compared with the northern district, is in the southern district. It is as far across the State of Iowa in the southern district of Iowa as it is in the northern district. The city of Dubuque is located on the eastern boundary of the State, almost due north of the city of Keokuk and the city of Fort Dodge, where a term of the Federal court is held. In the northern district there lies to the north the city of Des Moines, and about 65 miles from it the city of Sioux City, which is the western boundary of the southern district, almost due north of the city of Council Bluffs, which is the western boundary of the southern district.

Now, if Mr. Sells resides in Benton County, as I understand he does, he can get to the city of Keokuk, the most important city in the northern district in point of population and commerce and litigation, by traveling about 110 miles; he can get to the city of Fort Dodge, where the next term of the court is held, the center of the division, by traveling about 110 miles, and he can get to the city of Sioux City by traveling about 250 miles. Now, I am not criticising the State of Iowa; I am simply using this by way of comparison for the purpose of showing the abuse.

Mr. GEAR. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator stated by traveling 250 miles one could reach Sioux City from Dubuque. Let me call his attention to the fact that about the narrowest place in the State of Iowa is 299 miles, and it is 300 miles from Dubuque—326 miles, to be exact.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not make any statement of the kind. The Senator is entirely wrong in his understanding of what I said. I said a man living in the county of Benton can reach Sioux City by traveling about 250 miles. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GEAR. No, sir; you can not do it.

Mr. ALLEN. I have been over every foot of that territory a good many times.

Mr. GEAR. It must have been some years since the Senator was over it. I have been over it lately. You can not make it by traveling less than 300 miles.

Mr. ALLEN. How far is it from Waterloo to Dubuque? It is a little over 90 miles.

Mr. GEAR. It is over 90 miles. It is 96 miles.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Sells lives a few miles south of Waterloo, in the county of Benton. Now, how far wrong am I, when it is only a little over 300 miles across the State? He can make it in 250 miles, every foot of it, and he can make all his divisions by traveling 110 or 115 miles to each one of them.

I agree, Mr. President, fully with the policy of the committee of changing the fee system to a salary system. I am satisfied that there have been gross abuses, and that there are daily gross abuses of the fee system; that some of these men are put out to hound down people for the mere purpose of earning fees, a system of espionage, a system of persecution that is entirely foreign to the freedom of our Government. But what I want to know from the Senator from Colorado who has this matter in charge is, why the Judiciary Committee should think it wise to change the salaries as fixed by the House of Representatives from $1,000 to $2,000, and possibly more in some instances?

Why would it not be wiser and better to let the salaries remain as the House of Representatives have fixed them, and then, if it be proved by the practical execution of the law in the future that the salaries are not great enough, to raise them to that point where experience demonstrates they should be placed? It is a great deal easier to raise a salary than it is to reduce it after it is once fixed.

Mr. GEORGE. You will never get it down again.

Mr. ALLEN. You will never get it down again. That is true. I want to run over the bill briefly, because I am saying now about all I wish to say on this measure, and put in the RECORD the increases which have been made by the Senate committee over the salaries as fixed by the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives fixed the salary of the United States attorney for the northern district of Alabama at $4,000; the Senate proposes to raise it $1,000; the House of Representatives fixed the salary for the southern district of Alabama at $4,000; the Senate proposes to raise it a thousand dollars. The House of Representatives fixed the salary of the middle district of Alabama at $4,000, and that is proposed to be raised $1,000. In Arizona the amount was fixed by the House of Representatives at $4,000, which I think is left by the Senate. In California the House of Representatives fixed the salary of the district attorney for the northern district at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to raise it $1,000. In Colorado the salary was fixed at $4,000 by the House of Representatives, and it is proposed to be raised by the Senate $1,000. In Connecticut the salary was fixed by the House of Representatives at $2,000, and it is proposed to be raised by the Senate amendment $1,000, making it $3,000. In Delaware the salary was fixed by the House of Representatives at $2,000, and it is proposed to be raised by the Senate $500. In Florida the salary was fixed by the House of Representatives at $3,000 for the northern district, and it is proposed to be raised $1,000 by the Senate, and now I understand it is to be also raised a thousand dollars in the southern district.

Mr. CALL. I will correct the Senator in that statement. The salary in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives for the northern and southern districts of Florida was $3,000 for each of the district attorneys; and by the Committee on Appropriations it was changed to $3,500 for the northern and $4,000 for the southern district of Florida; but in the Senate the two districts have properly been put at the same amount, $4,000. That is the change made in accordance with the committee's recommendation. In Florida, in both districts, the amount received under the fee system was greater than the salary which is given by this bill, as shown by the returns in the Attorney-General's office. There was an error in those returns made by the Committee on the Judiciary. The northern district of Florida having been organized for many years, and about a year ago a new district being created, called the southern district of Florida, the returns for the northern district of Florida extended over the entire calendar and fiscal year. The returns for the new district of Florida were only for six months. In that way a mistake was made by the clerk of the Judiciary Committee in entering up the amount; but in point of fact there is no increase of salary, but a reduction, in the two districts of Florida.

Mr. ALLEN. I was not criticising the State of Florida. I was only pointing out the fact that the Senate amendment proposed to raise the salary in the two districts of Florida. The House of Representatives fixed the salary in each of those districts at $3,000, and the Senate committee now proposes to raise it to $4,000, making an increase of $2,000 in the aggregate, or $1,000 for each district. That is all I said. I presume the State of Florida is entitled to it; I do not know.

In the State of Georgia there is an increase of $500 recommended by the Senate over the amount fixed by the House of Representatives; and I now understand the Senator from Georgia wants to increase it still more.

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. He wishes to increase it $1,500 more, making a total increase of $2,000.

The same is true in the State of Idaho. The House of Representatives fixed the salary there at $2,500, and the Senate proposes to increase it $500. In the southern district of Illinois the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000. In Indiana the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $5,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $500. In the northern district of Iowa the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,500. There is where the enormous sum of mileage is paid to which I referred a moment ago.

In the southern district of Iowa the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and it is proposed to be raised $1,500 by the Senate. In Kansas the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and that is proposed to be raised $1,000 by the Senate. In Kentucky the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $5,000, and that is proposed to be raised $500 in the Senate. In the State of Maine the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $2,500, and that is proposed to be raised by the Senate $500. In Maryland the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to raise it $1,000, making it $4,000. In the district of Massachusetts the House fixed the salary at $5,000, and it is proposed by the Senate to increase that $500. In the western district of Michigan the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,000, and that is proposed to be increased by the Senate $1,000. In Minnesota the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000. In the northern district of Mississippi the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $2,000. In the southern district of Mississippi the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to amend it by increasing it to $5,000. In the western district of Missouri the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000. In Montana the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it by adding $1,500 more. In Nebraska the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,500, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000.

Mr. LINDSAY. That is right.

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; it is not.

In Nevada the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $2,500, and the Senate proposes to increase it $500. In New Hampshire the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $2,000, and the Senate proposes to increase that $500. In New Jersey the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $2,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $2,000. In New Mexico the salary was fixed at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000. In the eastern district of New York the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,500. In the western district of North Carolina the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,500, and the Senate proposes to increase it $500. In North Dakota the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,500, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,500. In the northern district of Ohio the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000. The same is true also of the southern district of Ohio. In Oregon the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,500. In the eastern district of Pennsylvania the salary was fixed by the House at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000, with a thousand dollars increase in the western district. In Rhode Island the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $2,000, and $500 increase is proposed by the Senate. In South Carolina the salary was fixed by the House at $4,500, and the Senate proposes an increase of $500. In the State of South Dakota the House of Representatives fixed the salary at $3,500, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,500.

Right in that connection, I will say that the State of South Dakota is not a mountain State, and therefore the district attorney does not draw double mileage. The mileage of Mr. Ezra W. Miller for the six months between the 1st day of July and the 31st day of December, 1895, amounted to $2,534, being over $5,000 a year mileage in that State, which is almost as level as a floor.

In Tennessee the House of Representatives fixed in the three districts a salary of $4,000 each, and the Senate proposes an increase of $1,000 each, making the total increase $3,000.

Mr. BATE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. I am not criticising the State of Tennessee at all.

Mr. BATE. I wish to say that Tennessee, out of those emoluments, has turned back into the Treasury much more than was taken out as salaries. The net amount taken in by the attorneys of these three districts in Tennessee as emoluments is $28,745.31, out of which they are entitled to retain, as a maximum, $6,000 each, leaving a net balance to the Government through this channel of $13,745.31 for the period referred to. And permit me to say that the marshals for these three districts present quite as good a record. It will thus be seen that the officer is getting $6,000 now, and he will get a thousand dollars less by the proposed change.

Mr. ALLEN. Tennessee has been remarkably honest in the matter of mileage.

Mr. BATE. Thank you.

Mr. ALLEN. In the eastern district of the State of Tennessee for the last six months the mileage was only $20. There has been, presumably, no return from the middle district,

Mr. BATE. There is no mileage there.

Mr. ALLEN. In the western district only $112.40 was charged for mileage. There is a mountain State, and if my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is correct, a State where there is some moonshining.

Mr. BATE. I suppose as much as there is anywhere. That is where the trouble arises.

I want to say that my remarks were simply made in defense of the State of Tennessee to show that, so far as the officials in that State are concerned, the Government loses nothing by the proposed change. I wish to say further that each of these officers is now receiving from the amount collected by him as emoluments $6,000, and in the case of marshals the salary as now proposed to be fixed is lessened by a thousand dollars in each case.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, it possibly ought to be lessened.

Mr. BATE. Very well, that may be so, but the Senator has referred to my State and said that it had a clear record upon this matter; yet it is not free from abuses under the present system, and I am in favor of changing the fee system, because of the abuses which are practiced under it.

Mr. ALLEN. That is exactly what I am contending for, that the system should be changed.

I wish to call attention to a fact which could not have escaped the Appropriations Committee and the Judiciary Committee, that the receipts of these offices have been in every instance, or in most instances, swelled in consequence of the fee system, and because the district attorneys in some of these districts have received eight or nine thousand dollars under the fee system it does not prove by any means that that is a fair and proper compensation for their services. Probably in many instances they should have earned less.

In the State of Texas there are three districts. In the northern district the House of Representatives fixed the salary of the district attorney at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000; in the eastern district the salary was fixed by the other House at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,000; in the western district the salary was fixed by the House at $3,500, and the Senate proposes an increase of $1,500. In Utah the House fixed the salary at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $2,000. In Vermont the salary was fixed by the House at $2,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $500.

Mr. TELLER. The Senate there proposes an increase really of $1,000, instead of $500. That is the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ALLEN. In the eastern district of Virginia the salary fixed by the House of Representatives was $3,500, and the Senate proposes an increase of $1,000; in the western district the salary was fixed by the House of Representatives at $4,000, and the Senate proposes an increase of $1,000. In Washington the salary was fixed by the House at $4,000, and the Senate proposes to increase that $1,000. In West Virginia the salary was fixed at $4,000 by the House, and the Senate proposes an increase there of $1,000.

There are two districts in the State of Wisconsin. The other House fixed the salary of one at $4,000 and the other at $3,000. The Senate proposes a total increase of $2,500 in the two districts. In Wyoming the salary was fixed by the House at $3,000, and the Senate proposes to increase it $1,500, according to the figures I have here.

Mr. President, in almost every case here there has been a deliberate change of the fees of the district attorneys as fixed by the House of Representatives, and we are standing here and having a Senator call them up paragraph by paragraph, and the Presiding Officer announcing "agreed to," without the slightest discussion or investigation or explanation.

Mr. TELLER. There seems to be some discussion on the amendments.

Mr. ALLEN. Well, there is some discussion now; but I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that we went down without any discussion from Alabama to Georgia, the Senator from Colorado standing at his desk in this Chamber and moving the adoption of amendments, and the Presiding Officer saying "agreed to," without the slightest explanation from the distinguished Senator from Colorado who has this matter in charge, or from any other Senator, why these salaries should be increased from the amounts fixed by the House of Representatives to the amounts proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

While I am in favor of abandoning the fee system, because I believe it leads to corruption, because I believe it to be oppressive and wrong in its execution, and while I believe in adopting the system of salaries, I do not believe the Senate should, by mere force of its power, raise these salaries as fixed by the House of Representatives, without the mover deigning at least some explanation to Senators who are not members of the committee as to why it is done. We have some interest in it; we represent States here to some extent, or are attempting to do so; and yet this committee comes here, and there is a play between the Senator who has the floor and the Presiding Officer, and every Senator must sit here with his mouth shut or get up whenever an item is proposed, travel over the same ground, and receive no explanation from the committee.

I am not speaking of the Senator from Colorado in an accusing sense, or at least I do not mean to do so, but what I mean is that these enormous increases in the salaries of these officers should not be made unless some reasonable written or printed report be laid before the Senate, which can be investigated by us and from which we can come to the conclusion, if it be true, that the advancing of these salaries is correct.

Mr. President, one more proposition at this time. I have no sympathy with the idea which has been advocated here—and I hear it every once in a while crop out in the Chamber—that it requires a high order of legal talent to fill these positions. It requires some legal talent, it is true, but the duties of these officers are in a majority of instances merely perfunctory. You know, and I know, that the highest order of legal intellect is rarely brought into the service of the United States in these offices. There are political debts to pay, usually they are to be paid to politicians, and sometimes to shysters, who walk into these positions and receive seven or eight thousand dollars a year for their services through this system, who could not earn $750 a year honestly in the practice of law; and yet, whenever this question is brought up, some grave and reverend Senator stands here and tells us it is the highest order of legal intellect and legal qualifications which must be brought into the discharge of these duties. I am in favor, decidedly in favor, of this system; but, Mr. President, before I take this medicine I want to know something about its composition; I want to know how it has been compounded; and I want the Senator having this bill in charge to say to me, or to say to the Senate, that there are some reasons for making these changes; and if there are reasons I am satisfied we will all agree to them. But I do not want the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Appropriations to come into this Chamber and by their mere caprice undertake to force these amendments to raise the salaries of these officers without some reasonable explanation of their conduct in doing so.

Mr. President, I will send to the desk and have read a list of district attorneys and the compensation they have been receiving in the form of mileage for the last six months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish it read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. TELLER. Would it not answer the purpose of the Senator as well to have the list printed in the RECORD without reading?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. Let it be published as part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The list referred to is as follows:

Mr. TELLER. I should like to go on with the bill now, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I would not occupy the time of the Senate in my present state of health unless I believed it was a duty incumbent upon me.

I am not and have not been in accord with the majority of the Senate from the very beginning of my service in this Chamber until now as to the proper amounts to be fixed for salaries of United States officers. I do not hope that anything I may say will change the vote of any Senator in this body, much less have the effect to carry out what I believe to be the true policy of the Senate in fixing salaries. But, sir, in the present condition of affairs, especially in the present pecuniary condition of the people of this country, oppressed with debt, the low prices of their produce, which rarely give to the husbandman, the farmer, the laborer any extra gains over a bare living, oppressed with taxation, I deem it my duty to put on the records of the Senate my opposition to this, as I regard it, very extravagant and very extraordinary compensation as proposed in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and also in the bill as proposed by the committee.

I have learned in a school which, I suppose, is now out of fashion the principles upon which compensation to public officers ought to be fixed. I have learned that public offices were not arranged, were not fixed for the accommodation of officials, or so that they might be enriched. I have regarded that service in a public office is rather a patriotic duty than a means of acquiring wealth, and as expressing in the strongest and tersest language that can be expressed, I desire to read to the Senate a section from the constitution of Vermont, which first appeared in that instrument in the year 1777, then again, I believe, in 1792, when that State was admitted into the Union, and again in 1793. I believe that that section, which I am going to read to the Senate, contains so much of truth so tersely and so properly expressed—contains the true rules by which every legislator, whether in the Federal Congress or in the State legislatures, should be guided—that I feel warranted in saying that it ought to be printed in letters of gold and hung up in every legislative hall in this country. It is as follows:

SEC. 23. As every freeman, to preserve his independence, if without a sufficient estate, ought to have some profession, calling, trade, or farm, whereby he may honestly subsist, there can be no necessity for nor use in establishing offices of profit, the usual effects of which are dependence and servility, unbecoming freemen, in the possessors or expectants, and faction, contention, and discord among the people. But, if any man is called into public service, to the prejudice of his private affairs, he has a right to a reasonable compensation; and whenever an office, through increase of fees or otherwise, becomes so profitable as to occasion many to apply for it the profits ought to be lessened by the legislature.

That, sir, contains the rule by which I think we ought to be guided.

But it is said that the United States ought to have the very best talent in supplying these offices. I think the United States ought to have fair, good talent, so that the officers may efficiently discharge their duties and protect the interests of the country. I hold in my hand a list of the salaries paid by nearly every State in the Union to the highest officer who represents the State in the courts of that State—the attorney-general. I propose to read that to the Senate as containing at least the judgment of the States, which we represent here, as to the amount of compensation that should be given to law officers.

Before I read this to the Senate I wish to remark that in nearly every instance, if I remember aright, the fees proposed to be allowed to the district attorneys of the United States are largely more than, and frequently double, the amount allowed the attorney-general of the State in which they serve.

In Alabama the attorney-general receives a salary of $2,250. Under this bill, as I remember, the United States district attorneys are to receive $5,000, more than double the salary allowed to the attorney-general of the State, an officer higher in rank and upon whom are devolved duties of a more delicate character than are devolved upon the district attorney.

I may mention as I go along that the governor of Alabama receives the sum of $3,000, less than the amount allowed to the United States district attorneys in that State.

I go to the State of Arkansas next. I find in that State, in the memorandum which I have, no statement as to the salary of the attorney-general. I ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to state the amount.

Mr. BERRY. I do not remember what compensation the present statute of Arkansas provides in regard to the attorney-general; but some years ago I think it was $2,000.

I will state to the Senator from Mississippi, however, as he has made a comparison between the duties of United States district attorneys and those of the attorney-general of a State, that the duties of a district attorney in my State require more work and labor than the duties of the attorney-general, and especially in the western district of Arkansas there is no comparison between the amount of work performed by the district attorney and by the attorney-general.

Mr. HOAR. I was just about to inquire of the Senator in which district Little Rock is situated?

Mr. BERRY. Little Rock is in the eastern and Fort Smith in the western district.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to conclude my remarks and let the explanations of Senators come afterwards.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator asked a question.

Mr. GEORGE. I asked for the amount; and I have no objection to the Senator's statement.

Mr. BERRY. If I am to be put on the witness stand I want to answer.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to the Senator answering, but I do not want to go into a general wrangle on the subject. I am getting at the facts now.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. The salary of the governor of the State of Arkansas, however, is only $3,000. The salary of the chief justice of that State is only $3,000. So one of the gentlemen who happens to be fortunate enough to get into the office of United States district attorney in the State of Arkansas gets not only more than the chief law officer of that State, but he gets more than the governor of the State, and more than the chief justice of the State.

I go next to the State of California. I find that the attorney-general there gets only $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. What officer?

Mr. GEORGE. The attorney-general of the State. I go next to Connecticut, and I do not find in this book the salary of the attorney-general of Connecticut. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut what is the salary of the attorney-general of his State?

Mr. PLATT. I believe we have no attorney-general; we did not have within a very few years at any rate, and I do not think any statute has been passed lately. There has been an attempt several times to create the office of attorney-general, but I do not think it has succeeded as yet.

Mr. GEORGE. I go to the State of Delaware. The attorney-general there gets the sum of $2,000; the governor gets $2,500. I go to the State of Florida next, and I find the attorney-general there gets $1,500. I wish the Senator from Florida who sits on my left [Mr. CALL] would state to me, for I have not read it, what it is proposed to give to the district attorney in the State of Florida under the pending bill?

Mr. PASCO. I will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the salary of that officer in Florida has been raised since that publication.

Mr. GEORGE. How much?

Mr. PASCO. Five hundred dollars. He now gets $2,000 a year.

Mr. GEORGE. He gets $2,000. Now, let us compare it. Will the Senator from Florida nearest me state what the district attorney now gets?

Mr. CALL. The district attorney now gets, I think, under the present bill about $2,000 less than he does under the existing law.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask what amount he gets under the bill.

Mr. CALL. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. GEORGE. Just double the amount that the attorney-general of the State gets, and as there are two United States district attorneys and only one attorney-general, they get $4,000 each for discharging the duties of the law officer of the State government.

Mr. PASCO. But there is no comparison between the amount of work——

Mr. GEORGE. Never mind; I am not asking about the work.

Mr. PASCO. Between the amount of work done by the attorney-general and that done by these other officers.

Mr. GEORGE. In Georgia the attorney-general gets the sum of $2,000; the governor gets a salary of $3,000; the chief justice of the State gets $3,000—very largely below the amount of fees or salaries fixed for the district attorneys in that State.

I go now to the State of Idaho. I do not find that they have any attorney-general in Idaho; at least the salary is not put down in this book, but the chief justice of that State gets the sum of $3,000, and the governor gets the sum of $3,000. I do not know what the district attorneys for Idaho will get under the bill, but I suppose it is largely in excess of that amount.

I go next to Illinois. I do not find that there is any attorney-general there. In Indiana the attorney-general gets $2,500. By this bill I suppose the district attorney gets about double that amount. I intend to put in the RECORD what the various States pay the highest law officer each has to represent its interests not only in the courts but to give legal opinions to the various executive officers of the State as to the construction of the laws and the constitution of that State.

In Iowa the attorney-general gets $1,500 and $5 per day when in court. If he were in court every day in the year except Sunday he would get only about $1,500 more. That would make $3,000.

In Kentucky I find that the attorney-general gets the sum of $500, with $10 per day while the legislature is in session, and as the legislature can only sit sixty days in every two years, giving him thirty days a year would be $300 more, and the attorney-general of Kentucky would get $800.

Kansas I passed. The attorney-general in that State gets $2,500; the governor, $3,000; the chief justice of the State gets $3,000.

In Louisiana I do not find the salary of the attorney-general here given. Will the Senator from Louisiana inform me what is the salary of the attorney-general of the State of Louisiana?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not exactly remember what the salary is. I think it is about $2,500.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest that if the Senator from Louisiana remembers the decisions or opinions rendered by the attorney-general in Louisiana he will probably be able to fix the salary. I imagine that the two go together.

Mr. GEORGE. In the State of Maine the attorney-general gets $2,000, the governor $2,000, the chief justice $2,500. In the State of Maryland the attorney-general gets $2,000. In Massachusetts for the attorney-general the figures are blank—they are not put down. I do not see a Senator from Massachusetts here so that I may inquire what is the salary of the attorney-general in that State.

In Michigan the attorney-general gets $3,000. In Minnesota he gets $3,500. In Mississippi I find that the sum is left blank. I will ask my colleague if he remembers the salary of the attorney-general of Mississippi?

Mr. WALTHALL. It is $2,500.

Mr. GEORGE. Two thousand five hundred dollars. I find no statement as to the salary of the attorney-general in the State of Missouri. I do not see either Senator from Missouri present so that I may ask him, but I will venture to say——

Mr. WHITE. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that if he recounts all the Senators who are not present he might perhaps develop the absence of a quorum here.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all bosh, allow me to say, with due respect to the Senator.

Mr. VEST. What did the Senator from Mississippi ask about Missouri?

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know the salary of the attorney-general of Missouri. It is not put down here.

Mr. VEST. It is $3,500.

Mr. GEORGE. Three thousand five hundred dollars. I go to Nebraska. The salary of the governor of that State is $2,500—less than the amount to be allowed the district attorney under either of the bills before the Senate. The salary of the attorney-general is $2,000. I find no statement as to the salary of the attorney-general of Nevada, nor of the State of New Jersey. In New York the attorney-general gets $5,000, which seems to be about the average salary allowed to the district attorneys under these bills.

I go to the State of North Carolina. I do not find that the salary of the attorney-general is stated, but I will state that the salary of the governor is $3,000 and of the chief justice of the State $2,500. I think I can be safe in assuming that the attorney-general does not get more than the chief justice.

I go to Ohio, a great and rich State, probably the third State in the Union in population, and I find that the attorney-general gets the sum of $2,000. In Oregon the salary of the attorney-general is left blank and so I can not state it. The same is true in Pennsylvania, which is left blank. In Rhode Island the salary of the attorney-general is $2,500; in South Carolina it is $2,100; in South Dakota it is $1,800. In Tennessee I find no statement. I believe the attorney-generals there are district attorneys.

Mr. BATE. No, sir; we have an attorney-general also.
Mr. GEORGE. What is his salary?
Mr. BATE. I do not recollect exactly, but I think it is $3,000. I wish to state, in addition to the Senator from Mississippi touching that, that the attorney-general, as I expect is the case in many of the other States——
Mr. GEORGE. Never mind about that.
Mr. BATE. I will state in connection with Tennessee, however, that the attorney-general has the exclusive right of publishing the reports of the supreme court, which is of much importance to him as an income, because it gives him an income additional to his salary.
Mr. GEORGE. That does not apply to any State except Tennessee, so far as I know.
Mr. BATE. I reckon it does.
Mr. GEORGE. It does not apply to the State of Mississippi, nor to any other State, so far as I know. If the Senator from Tennessee knows of any other State in which the attorney-general ex officio is reporter of the supreme court he can state it.
Mr. BATE. I only know what I said. I read the Mississippi reports with the name of Senator GEORGE attached thereto. I expect he was attorney-general there once, and very likely he made the reports. I do not know what compensation he got.
Mr. GEORGE. I never had the honor of being attorney-general of Mississippi.
Mr. BATE. The Senator was the reporter.
Mr. GEORGE. I never ranked high enough in the profession in Mississippi to be selected for that office.
Mr. BATE. You edited the reports there?
Mr. GEORGE. The very best lawyers in the State we get there for the sum of $2,000 and $2,500.
Mr. BATE. Were you not the reporter?
Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but I was not attorney-general.
Mr. CALL. How much was the reporter paid?
Mr. GEORGE. It was a fee.
Mr. CALL. How much?
Mr. GEORGE. I do not know; I never did know.
Mr. PASCO. May I ask the Senator what his salary was as a reporter?
Mr. GEORGE. I had no salary.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Chair understands that the Senator from Mississippi declines to be interrupted.
Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this is all bosh. Senators will not come up and meet the question, but inquire about the salary of the reporter and things of that sort. It is belittling the dignity of the occasion.
Mr. PASCO. I thought that is what the Senator——
Mr. GEORGE. It is making fun of the groans of the people of the United States, burdened as they are with debt and taxation.
In Virginia the salary is $2,500; in Washington it is $2,000; in Wisconsin it is $3,000. That ends the States so far as I have them here in this book, which is the American Tribune Almanac, and I suppose it is reliable authority.
Mr. President, I have about done my duty. I have put upon the record what the States pay officers not of similar grade, but of higher grade, than the district attorneys of the United States. I have put that in the RECORD, so that if Senators who have not looked into this matter desire to look into it they may know that the statesmen at home where these men serve think they can get competent legal representatives in the courts for a much smaller sum than we propose to pay.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations which was passed over.
The next amendment was on page 117, line 6, after the word "Georgia," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; so as to read:

For the southern district of Georgia, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.
The next amendment was, on page 117, line 7, after the word "Idaho," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; so as to read:

For the district of Idaho, $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. In line 7, I move to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,500."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 117, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 11, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand" and insert "five thousand five hundred"; in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 15, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the northern district of Illinois, $5,500; for the southern district of Illinois, $5,000; for the district of Indiana, $5,500; for the northern and southern districts of Iowa, each $5,500; for the district of Kansas, $,5,000; for the district of Kentucky, $5,500.

The amendment was agreed to.
The Secretary read the next item, as follows:

For the eastern district of Louisiana, $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. The Judiciary Committee recommend $5,000 instead of $3,000. I move to strike out "three" and insert "five" before "thousand."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 17, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the western district of Louisiana, $2,500.

Mr. TELLER. In line 17, I move to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 18, before the word "dollars" to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; so as to read:

For the district of Maine, $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. In line 18, I move to strike out "three" before "thousand" and insert "four"; so as to read, "$4,000."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the district of Maryland, $4,000.

Mr. TELLER. I move to insert "$5,000" instead of "$4,000"; so as to read:

For the district of Maryland, $5,000.

That is a committee amendment.
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 20, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 25, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the district of Massachusetts, $5,500; for the eastern district of Michigan, $4,000; for the western district of Michigan, $4,000; for the district of Minnesota, $5,000; for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, each $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.
The Secretary read line 25, as follows:

For the eastern district of Missouri, $4,000.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out "four" before "thousand" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Missouri, $5,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 118, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; in line 7, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "four"; in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the western district of Missouri, $5,000; for the district of Montana, $5,000; for the district of Nebraska, $5,000; for the district of Nevada, $3,000; for the district of New Hampshire, $2,500; for the district of New Jersey, $4,000; for the district of New Mexico, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.
The Secretary read line 9, as follows:

For the northern district of New York, $4,000.

Mr. TELLER. In line 10, I move to strike out "four" before "thousand" and insert "five"; so as to read "$5,000."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 11, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred"; in line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 19, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand" and insert "five thousand five hundred"; in line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of New York, $4,500; for the eastern district of North Carolina, $4,000; for the western district of North Carolina, $5,000; for the district of North Dakota, $5,000; for the northern and southern districts of Ohio, each $5,000; for the district of Oklahoma, $5,000; for the district of Oregon, $5,500; for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, $5,000; for the western district of Pennsylvania, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 22, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Rhode Island, $2,500.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000." This is recommended by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 23, before the words "district of South Carolina," to insert "and western districts of the," and in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; so as to read:

For the eastern and western districts of South Carolina, $5,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment, and I ask that it be read at the desk.

Mr. TELLER. I will state that the amendment which the Senator from South Carolina proposes is recommended by the Judiciary Committee, I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Instead of the language following the word "dollars," in line 22, relating to South Carolina, insert:

For the eastern district of South Carolina, $5,000; $3,000 of which shall be for the performance of the duties of district attorney for the western district of that State.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to explain simply to the Senate that the phraseology as it is printed here creates confusion. Senators will observe that it is very strange. It reads, "For the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina."

The fact is, we have two judicial districts in our State and have had since 1823, but the phraseology which is used by the committee in the amendment is copied from the Revised Statutes, which themselves are muddled; in other words, they are contradictory. In the section from which this is copied, section 546, I think it is, this language is used, and the committee copied the words as taken from that section, but in subsequent sections the division of the State is clearly ascertained, and in all the acts bearing on our State it is clearly stated and recognized that we have two judicial districts.

I have a little bill here which the Judiciary Committee has reported favorably, and it is on the Calendar, which contemplates the appointment of a district attorney and marshal for each of these separate districts. If we leave this language in here it will create confusion in the mind of the court itself, possibly, as to what it means, and I have inserted the amendment with that phraseology. While I do not want to press the bill now in the shape of an amendment, but will ask the Senate to pass it after a while, the amendment as I offer it will clarify the situation and avoid the confusion which would result from the adoption of the amendment of the committee as it appears in the bill.

Mr. TELLER. There is no objection on the part of the committee to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; on page 119, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the district of South Dakota, $5,000; for the eastern, middle, and western districts of Tennessee, each $5,000; for the northern district of Texas, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, line 4, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Texas, $4,000.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out "four thousand," before the word "dollars," and insert "five thousand five hundred"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Texas, $5,500.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 5, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand," and in line 6, before word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the western district of Texas, $5,000; for the district of Utah, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, line 7, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Vermont, $2,500.

Mr. TELLER. That is a mistake. The five hundred proposed by the committee should be stricken out and it should be made $3,000. I move to amend the amendment so as to read: "For the district of Vermont, $3,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 119, in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Virginia, $4,500; for the western district of Virginia, $5,000; for the district of Washington, $5,000; for the district of West Virginia, $5,000; for the eastern district of Wisconsin, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 119, line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred"; so as to read:

For the western district of Wisconsin, $4,500.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out "$4,500" and insert "$5,000"; so as to read:

For the western district of Wisconsin, $5,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 16, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "four thousand five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Wyoming, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [9] 7, on page 119, line 18, after the word "judge," to insert "of any district"; in line 21, after the words "Attorney-General," to strike out "not exceeding the number provided by law during the last fiscal year, except upon the order of the President"; on page 120, line 5, after the word "necessary," to insert "expenses for lodging and," and in line 11, after the word "magistrate," to insert "and while otherwise necessarily absent from their respective official residences on official business"; so as to make the clause read:

That whenever, in the opinion of the district judge of any district or the chief justice of any territory and the district attorney, evidenced by writing, the public interest requires it, one or more assistant district attorneys may be appointed by the Attorney-General, but such opinion shall state to the Attorney-General the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing the necessity therefor. Such assistant district attorneys shall be paid such salary as the Attorney-General may from time to time determine as to each, which shall in no case exceed $2,500 per annum: Provided, That the necessary expenses for lodging and subsistence actually paid, not exceeding $4 per day, and actual and necessary traveling expenses of the district attorney and his assistants, while absent from their respective official residences and necessarily employed in going to, returning from, and attending before any United States court, commissioner, or other committing magistrate, and while otherwise necessarily absent from their respective official residences on official business shall be allowed and paid in the manner hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 20 on page 120.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that after the word "paid," in line 19, the words should be inserted, "in lieu of the salaries, fees, per centums, and other compensation now allowed by law."

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to move that amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Is that the same language, I will ask the Senator from Missouri, in the bill in regard to district attorneys?

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to put it in there if it has not been put in on page 116, line 14. After the word "paid" there I wanted these words inserted.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to the Senator's purpose as expressed in his language, but it strikes me that it would be well to have precisely the same meaning in the bill as applied to the two classes of officers expressed in the same words. My suggestion is, that instead of the language he has used he should use the language applicable to district attorneys.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the words that I want to put in, that were furnished me by the Auditor for the Department who has charge of them.

Mr. TELLER. Let the same words be put in at both places.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want the words also inserted in line 14, page 116. I happened to be out at the time that was passed upon.

Mr. TELLER. Let the words be inserted here as applied to the marshals, and then we can go back and put them in there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "paid," in line 19, page 120, it is proposed to insert:

In lieu of the salaries, fees, per centums, and other compensation now allowed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Now turn back to page 116.

The SECRETARY. After the word "paid," in line 14, page 116, it is proposed to insert:

In lieu of the salaries, fees, per centums, and other compensation now allowed by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 120, section 8, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

That the United States marshal for each judicial district of the United States shall be paid an annual salary as follows: For the northern and middle districts of the State of Alabama, each $5,000; for the southern district of the State of Alabama, $4,000; for the Territory of Arizona, $5,000; for the eastern district of Arkansas, $4,000; for the western district of Arkansas, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 121, line 2, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the northern district of California, $4,500.

Mr. TELLER. On page 121, line 2, I move to strike out "three" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the northern district of California, $4,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 121, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 6, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in line 7, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the southern district of California, $3,000; for the district of Colorado, $5,000; for the district of Connecticut, $3,000; for the district of Delaware, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 121, line 7, before "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the District of Columbia, $5,500.

Mr. HOAR. There is a letter from the Attorney-General which I should like to have read on the subject of the marshal of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read. I will accept the amendment increasing the amount to $6,000.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will let the letter go into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. TELLER. I know the Attorney-General thinks it ought to be six thousand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to increase the amount to $6,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. Let the letter be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. The substance of the letter simply is that the service of civil process and fees from that source are larger here than any other place in the United States, and, of course, all that is abolished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., March 23, 1896.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the legislative bill (H. R. 6248) as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Appropriations. I notice on page 121, line 6, that the salary of the United States marshal for the District of Columbia has been fixed at $5,500. In my opinion the United States marshal for the District of Columbia should receive the maximum compensation, and as the salaries have been increased over those passed by the House, and $6,000 is now the maximum compensation to be paid any marshal, I earnestly recommend that that amount be fixed as the salary of the United States marshal for the District of Columbia. It is proper in this connection to state that the earnings in civil cases in the District of Columbia exceed the amount allowed the marshal for his salary. This is only true in one other district, namely, the southern district of New York for the fiscal year 1895, as appears from House Document No. 167, under heading, "Earnings from individuals." As the salary in that district has been fixed at $6,000, the salary of the United States marshal for the District of Columbia should, I think, be fixed at the same amount.

Very respectfully, JUDSON HARMON,
Attorney-General.

Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR,
Chairman Judiciary Committee, United States Senate.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 121, line 7, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for the northern and southern districts of Florida, each $3,000" and insert "for the northern district of Florida, $3,500; for the southern district of Florida, $4,000"; so as to read:

For the northern district of Florida, $3,500; for the southern district of Florida, $4,000.

Mr. TELLER. I move to amend the amendment, in line 9, page 121, by striking out "$3,500" and inserting "$4,000"; so as to read:

For the northern district of Florida, $4,000

Mr. PASCO. In asking the committee to make this amendment I have done it not as a matter of favor but as a matter of justice, and I should have said nothing but for the remarks which were made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and others after I had offered a similar amendment in the Senate with reference to the salaries of the district attorneys in my State.

The receipts of the marshal for the northern district of Florida, according to the report which has been furnished us here from the Attorney-General's Office, show that the marshal for the northern district of Florida is receiving under the present arrangement $4,775.27 as his net emoluments for the year, and when he receives, under this new order of things, $4,000 his emoluments are cut down to that extent over $775.

The amount to be received by the marshal for the Southern district has been raised, and very properly so. I understand it was originally put at the smaller sum because it had been overlooked that the receipts as shown by this table from the Attorney-General's Office were for only six months, and amounted for that time to $2,796.64. Under the new arrangement both of these officers and both of the district attorneys really get less than under the old. As I understand the whole scheme, the result of it will be not to increase salaries, but to reduce them.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] just now in a speech of some length called attention to the salaries that are being received by the leading principal law officers of the different States, and he made a comparison with the salaries that are being received by them and by these United States officers. But those officers as a general rule have very much less work to do than the United States district attorneys. I asked him with reference to the salary that he was getting as a law officer in the State of Mississippi, where he resides. He is a very able lawyer and has filled some of the highest positions in that State, and I asked him what his salary or compensation was in the position that he filled as reporter of the supreme court. I think if he had answered civilly the question that I asked him it would have been demonstrated that the State of Mississippi had treated him in that office in no parsimonious spirit, and the comparison of that compensation with the salaries under discussion would have been pertinent and perhaps valuable.

Mr. President, I wish to say further that I have not been in favor of substituting the salary system for the fee system when applied only to these two classes of officers—the district attorneys and the United States marshals. I have thought that if this is to be a reform and to be carried out it should go further; that it should include the clerks and the deputy marshals and the United States commissioners, and we would then have come nearer to reaching the root of the evil that has been complained of in all the remarks that have been made in connection with the subject. In my judgment we should have come nearer reaching the root of the evil if we had put the commissioners and the deputy marshals under the fee system instead of beginning with the district attorneys and the United States marshals. I had hoped when the Judiciary Committee attempted to amend the scheme that was brought in from the other House that they would make it cover these officers also.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 121, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; so as to read:

For the northern district of Georgia, $5,000; for the southern district of Georgia, $3,000.

Mr. BACON. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$3,000" and inserting "$5,000," so as to make the compensation $5,000.

Mr. TELLER. That is the arrangement agreed upon by the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out "three" where it first appears in line 3, page 121, and inserting "five"; so as to read "$5,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 121, line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 15, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the district of Idaho, $3,500; for the northern district of Illinois, $5,500; for the southern district of Illinois, $5,000; for the district of Indiana, $5,500; for the northern and southern districts of Iowa, each $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 121, in line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the district of Kansas, $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The modified amendments are from the Judiciary Committee, I understand.

Mr. TELLER. They are all suggestions from the Judiciary Committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 121, line 21, before the word "dollars" to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Kentucky, $5,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 121, line 22, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Louisiana, $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "three thousand" and inserting "four thousand"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Louisiana, $4,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; so as to read:

For the western district of Louisiana, $3,000.

Mr. TELLER. Before the word "thousand" I move to strike out "three" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the western district of Louisiana, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 122, line 1, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Maryland, $3,500.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out the word "three" and insert "four" before "thousand"; so as to read:

For the district of Maryland, $4,500.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 122, line 3, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand" and insert "five thousand five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Massachusetts, $5,500; for the eastern district of Michigan, $5,000; for the western district of Michigan, $4,000; for the district of Minnesota, $5,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 122, line 6, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for the northern and southern districts of Mississippi, each $3,000" and insert "for the southern district of Mississippi, $4,000; for the southern district of Mississippi, $5,000"; so as to read:

For the northern district of Mississippi, $4,000; for the southern district of Mississippi, $5,000.

Mr. TELLER. In line 8, I move to strike out "four thousand" and insert "five thousand"; so as to read "five thousand dollars each."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 122, line 10, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Missouri, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next item, as follows:

For the western district of Missouri, $4,000.

Mr. VEST. I move to insert after "four thousand" the words "five hundred." The two Missouri districts ought to be at the same amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment moved by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 11, page 122, after the word "thousand," insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the western district of Missouri, $4,500.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 122, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "two thousand five hundred" and insert "three thousand"; in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 20, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "six"; in line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 25, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "for the northern and southern districts of Ohio, each $4,000," and insert "for the northern district of Ohio, $4,500; for the southern district of Ohio, $5,000"; on page 123, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; so as to read:

For the district of Montana, $5,000; for the district of Nebraska, $5,000; for the district of Nevada, $3,000; for the district of New Hampshire, $3,000; for the district of New Jersey, $3,000; for the district of New Mexico, $5,000; for the northern district of New York, $5,000; for the eastern district of New York, $5,000; for the southern district of New York, $6,000; for the eastern district of North Carolina, $4,000; for the western district of North Carolina, $5,000; for the district of North Dakota, $5,000; for the northern district of Ohio, $4,500; for the southern district of Ohio, $5,000; for the district of Oklahoma, $5,500; for the district of Oregon, $5,000; for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, $5,000; for the western district of Pennsylvania, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, line 9, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred"; so as to read:

For the district of Rhode Island, $2,500.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out the word "two," in line 9, before "thousand," and insert "three"; so as to read "$3,500."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 9, after the word "eastern," to insert "and western districts of the," and in line 10, before the word "dollars," to strike out "four thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; so as to read:

For the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina, $5,000.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] desires to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. TELLER. It is similar to the other amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. After the word "dollars," in line 9, on page 123, I move to strike out all down to and including the word "dollars," in line 11, and insert:

For the eastern district of South Carolina, $5,000, $3,000 of which shall be for the performance of the duties of marshal of the western district of that State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Judiciary Committee to accept the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. TELLER. We accept the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 123, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the district of South Dakota, $5,000; for the eastern, middle, and western districts of Tennessee, each $5,000; for the northern district of Texas, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 123, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "four"; so as to read:

For the eastern district of Texas, $4,000.

Mr. TELLER. That should be left $5,000. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 123, line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "five thousand"; in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "four"; in line 19, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "four"; in line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand five hundred" and insert "four thousand"; in line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 22, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the western district of Texas, $5,000: for the district of Utah, $4,000; for the district of Vermont, $4,000; for the eastern district of Virginia, $4,000; for the western district of Virginia, $5,000; for the district of Washington, $5,000; for the district of West Virginia, $5,000; for the eastern district of Wisconsin, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. In line 25, on page 123, the word "four" should be stricken out and "five" inserted; and on page 124, line 1, the words "five hundred" should be stricken out after "thousand," so as to read "$5,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment after the words "western district of Wisconsin," in line 25, by striking out "$4,500," the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and inserting "$5,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2, on page 124, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "five"; so as to read:

For the district of Wyoming, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 124, line 15, after the word "actual," to insert "expenses for lodging and," and in line 16, after the word "day," to insert "and the necessary actual expenses in transporting prisoners, including necessary guard hire"; so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 9. That when in the opinion of the Attorney-General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the marshal, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing necessity for the same, allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney-General, from time to time, and paid as hereinafter provided. When any of such office deputies is engaged in the service or attempted service of any writ, process, or subpœna, or when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment, on official business, he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $2 per day, and the necessary actual expenses in transporting prisoners, including necessary guard hire; and he shall make and render accounts thereof as hereinafter provided.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the amendment is agreed to, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if there is any similar statute——

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator puts his question, may I make a mere amendment in the form of a few words?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I move to insert in line 12 of the pending section, after the word "subpœna," the words "or other order of the court." I am not sure that all orders of a court are covered by the words "writ, process, or subpœna." I move also to strike out the word "or," at the end of line 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section [11] 9, on page 124, line 11, after the word "process," it is proposed to strike out "or"; and in line 12, after the word "subpœna," to insert "or other order of the court"; so as to read:

When any of such office deputies is engaged in the service or attempted service of any writ, process, subpœna, or other order of the court, or when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment, on official business, he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I now desire to ask the Senator from Colorado who has this subject in charge if there is any similar power existing or conferred by present law upon the Attorney-General as that which he proposes to confer upon him by section 9 of this bill?

Mr. TELLER. I do not hear the Senator. Will he repeat his question?

Mr. ALLEN. This section provides—

That when in the opinion of the Attorney-General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the marshal, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing necessity for the same, allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney-General, from time to time, and paid as hereinafter provided.

Have we any statute now in existence as broad as that?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think we have, and this is to cut off the marshal who has been doing that and lodge that power with the Attorney-General, for it has to be lodged somewhere. There must be somebody who has the power to appoint a number of deputies, if there should be occasion, and it was thought best to put the power in the hands of the Attorney-General. I do not think he exercises any power of that kind now. I do not think he supervises the marshals.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know how to amend the section except by moving to strike it out, which I shall do.

Mr. TELLER. That is the provision as it came from the House of Representatives. We did not wrestle with it in any shape.

Mr. ALLEN. I move to strike out all of section 9, on page 124, down to and including the word "provided," in line 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the words proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section [11] 9, on page 124, down to and including the word "provided," in line 10, as follows:

SEC. [11] 9. That when in the opinion of the Attorney-General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the marshal, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing necessity for the same, allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance, upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney-General, from time to time, and paid as hereinafter provided.

Mr. ALLEN. There are two dangerous features about the provision which has just been read. In the first place, it confers upon the Attorney-General the power to increase the number of deputy United States marshals upon an ex parte showing made to him by the marshals themselves. It goes without saying, that if this part of section 9 becomes the law there will not be a judicial district in the United States where there will not be a showing for a deputy with a large salary attached. It occurs to me that the thing to be done is not to transfer the legislative function from Congress, where it belongs, to the Attorney-General and the marshal, but for the Committee on the Judiciary, if they are taking part in this matter, and especially the Committee on Appropriations, to fix these salaries exactly as they fix the salaries of judges and United States district attorneys and marshals.

Mr. VEST. Is it not the law now that the Attorney-General allows the marshal, upon his request, the number of deputies that he employs?

Mr. ALLEN. I was asking the Senator from Colorado that question.

Mr. VEST. I so understand.

Mr. TELLER. My recollection is that the marshal does it on his own motion.

Mr. VEST. No; as I recollect, the law applies now to the Attorney-General.

Mr. TELLER. That may be.

Mr. VEST. And the Attorney-General permits the marshal to employ the number of deputies he shows to be necessary for the public service in his district.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I had called to my attention the other day an instance in the District of Columbia where the appropriation had been exhausted out of which this allowance has heretofore been made with the approval of the Attorney-General. He required last year that the allowance for this purpose should be taken out of the allowance for the marshal himself; in other words, it was deducted in that particular case, for want of an appropriation, from the salary of the marshal, which was then $6,000.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, whether or not this power by existing law resides in the marshal himself is nothing to the argument I make. It is a dangerous power to place in the hands of the marshal or of the Attorney-General. We are simply abdicating our powers as legislators here and we are turning over the power to legislate to the Attorney-General.

The truth is, that much of the legislation of this country has been by act of Congress conferred upon the heads of Departments and the heads of bureaus. It is a very common thing for them to create offices, to abolish them, to attach salaries to them, and take the salaries away at their pleasure. This provision will do nothing but increase the horde of officeholders in this country, and by that means increase the appropriations of Congress from year to year, and eat out the substance of the people.

I want to call attention for a moment, and only for a moment, for I have no desire to delay the Senate, to the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1895, page 4. The Attorney-General says:

The expenses of the Federal courts have steadily increased, as well as their business, as will appear by the following statement:

Fiscal year—		Total expenses.
1888		$3,864,898.15
1889		4,031,189.09
1890		4,761,204.60
1891		4,992,195.64
1892		5,049,778.96
1893		5,628,223.21
1894—
Incurred and paid in 1894	$4,551,373.61
Incurred in 1894 and paid in 1895	1,643,726.89
		*6,195,100.50
1895—
Incurred and paid in 1895		*5,412,718.91

*Amounts yet to be paid to be added, as appropriations are available for two years after the year for which they are made.

It is quite evident that the time has come in the history of this country when we must call a halt upon the judicial branch of this Government, and, in fact, upon every other branch, for that matter. The persons employed in the service of the Government in different departments seem absolutely crazy and mad to get their hands into the public Treasury clear up to their shoulders; and when they are getting respectable and decent salaries, in many instances very much above their merits, they are constantly clamoring for more, until the expenditures of the Government have run from about $50,000,000 during the Administration of Mr. Buchanan, when we had about thirty-one or thirty-two million people, possibly a little more, to $500,000,000, practically, in 1896, when we have a population of seventy million and some six hundred and odd thousand, I think, as it is now estimated. The population has increased a little over 100 per cent, and we have increased the expenditures of our Government about 450 per cent, almost 500 per cent.

How has this come about? What has caused this increase in the expenditures of the Government? It is this mad disposition upon the part of every man who gets into public position to take every dollar by hook or by crook, and principally by crook, that he can get out of the Government. Here is given power to the Attorney-General to create more offices, offices without limitation, and fix the salaries of those offices at just such sum as he may see fit. Let it be admitted that the Attorney-General will always be a man competent to discharge his duties; let it be admitted, if you will, that he will at all times be a patriotic citizen and discharge his duties as faithfully and as well as he can; yet we know by experience and by observation that the pressure which will be brought to bear upon such a man to make positions for his political friends, with fat salaries attached to them, will be with such force that he can not resist it. Is it wise, is it the proper thing to do? Is it statesmanlike for us to transfer the legislative power which the Constitution vests in us to the Attorney-General or to the head of any other Department, without any limit or check upon him in the creation of offices and the fixing of salaries?

I presume that this section will go through. I have no hope of inducing the Committee on Appropriations to apply economy in this respect. If it were some little measure, or if some individual Senator was asking for the payment of some little debt due a citizen, the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill would be on his feet in a moment and make a point of order under Rule XVI, which is made to do duty here on almost all convenient and inconvenient occasions.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I have not examined the bill so carefully as has the Senator from Nebraska, but I should like to ask him whether there is any other provision in the bill for the employment of deputies by the marshals of the various districts of the United States?

Mr. ALLEN. I know of nothing else, though there may be.

Mr. GRAY. I merely want to ask if there is no provision other than this for the necessary and proper appointment of deputies so that the office may be properly and efficiently administered, whether this is the proper form to make it, is another question; but I want to know if there is any other provision for the appointment of deputies.

Mr. ALLEN. I know of none, though there may be. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] can tell.

Mr. GRAY. Then, if this provision be stricken out, would not the office of marshal be in some respects paralyzed when the public service requires that it should be efficient?

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all. I presume the present system of doing business would be in operation if these provisions do not take effect.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say, if the Senator will allow me, I understand if this motion prevails the whole scheme to abolish these fees and the whole scheme for the enforcing the laws of the United States will depend on the individual capacity of the marshal, without any assistant or deputy. Does the Senator desire that? If not, ought he not to accompany his amendment with a proposition of a better plan, if the old scheme does not remain in operation?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what the Senator from Massachusetts understands, and I am not concerned in knowing what he understands, nor am I concerned in offering a better plan. I think I could do it if I had five minutes to draft it.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator, of course, does not mean to say he is not concerned with the efficiency of the administration of the marshals' offices for which we are providing?

Mr. ALLEN. I am not in this sense, that it is not proper for the Senator from Delaware or the Senator from Massachusetts to transfer from the shoulders of the Judiciary Committee or the Committee on Appropriations the responsibility to some individual member to cure this provision.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has suggested a point about which I do not know that I am correct, but it was touched upon a few minutes ago in a colloquy here. Section 780 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

Every marshal may appoint one or more deputies, who shall be removable from office by the judge of the district court or by the circuit court for the district, at the pleasure of either.

I was under the impression that the Attorney-General made the appointment on the suggestion of the marshal, but I find that that is in the Indian Territory, and it was that which misled me. This is the general provision. I do not understand that the provision in the appropriation bill which is before us changes that law at all. This is a provision which gives to the Attorney-General the power to "allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance." That is very different from employing marshals.

Mr. GRAY. To guard property.

Mr. VEST. To guard property and serve writs.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, why not call them "clerks," as they are?

Mr. VEST. That may be. This provision is only for the clerical force; and it does not interfere at all with the general statute, as I understand, which gives to the marshal the right to appoint one or more deputies to assist him in the discharge of his functions.

Mr. HOAR. That is covered in the next section of the bill, redrafted and reenacted.

Mr. VEST. Yes.

That at any time when, in the opinion of the marshal of any district, the public interest will thereby be promoted, he may appoint one or more deputy marshals—

That is the law as it is now—

for such district, who shall be known as field deputies.

And section 9 applies to the clerical force.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, Mr. President; but the Senator does not answer the proposition that it increases the number of officers. Now, look how artfully this provision is worded. Speaking of the Attorney-General, the language is this:

That when in the opinion of the Attorney-General the public interest requires it—

Of course the "public interest" always requires it when he has men thundering at his doors for political appointments—

he may, on the recommendation of the marshal—

The marshal is situated about as the Attorney-General is. He wants to increase the number of offices to accommodate his friends—which recommendation shall state the facts, as distinguished from conclusions, showing necessity for the same, allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance—

Which is simply employing one or more clerks in his office. Call them marshals, call them deputies, or call them what you see fit, they are simply clerks—upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney-General, from time to time, and paid as hereinafter provided.

He is not confined to the appointment of one clerk, nor is he confined to the appointment of two clerks. He may, under this language, if he can induce the Attorney-General to do so, increase the number of officeholders, clerks, or clerical deputies, or whatever you call them, to any number without limit.

Is it a wise thing for Congress to turn this power over to the Attorney-General and to the marshals of the various districts? Why did not the Judiciary Committee take hold of this matter? Why did not the Judiciary Committee inquire into the existing condition of affairs in these different judicial districts? Why did they not inform themselves as to the necessity of these officers in the different judicial districts of this country, and then create the offices by name that were necessary to be created, and fix the salaries and compensation as they ought to be? No; the Judiciary Committee escape; they run away from this duty; they turn over to the Attorney-General a limitless power, and to the marshals a limitless power, and the Attorney-General may fix the compensation at $5 or $5,000 a year so far as this provision of the bill is concerned. There is not the slightest limitation upon it except his mere caprice, his mere conscience.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] wants to know and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] wants to know what I would substitute for it, what I would put in place of it. I can tell these Senators very quickly what I would put in place of it. I would meet, if necessary, with the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, with all the facts before me; I would canvass every district of the United States; I would determine from the facts which were presented whether there was a necessity for an increase of clerical force in the marshals' offices, and if there was, I would determine the character of that force, the number of persons that were needed, and I would fix their salaries exactly as the Constitution requires us to fix the salaries, in the form of legislation. Here is a vast army of officers in embryo to be created under this bill to increase the appropriations of Congress at another session or at another Congress.

Although it is somewhat disjointed from the connection in which I read a moment ago, I desire to read this extract from the report of the Attorney-General for 1895:

> The number of places of holding Federal courts has increased from 186 in 1885 to 227 in 1895.

But there is no comparison between the increase of the places of holding court and the increase of the expenses of holding these various terms of court.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, the Judiciary Committee has been at work on this subject with a great deal of zeal for six years, and it submitted a report when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was a member of that committee. He gave very great and thorough attention to the general scheme, and corresponded, I think, with the judges and other court officials in every district in the country. They all had an opportunity to be heard, and many of them were heard at great length. He reported two bills, one for the marshals and one for the district attorneys.

The Senate, after considerable discussion, could not agree on the details of those bills, and the bills failed. Another measure was reported in the last Congress. I did not myself see how the judicial department could get along without the system of fees in regard to marshals, for reasons which I shall not detain the Senate by explaining. But I finally became a convert, hearing of the complaints from all parts of the country, not merely from the South and the newly settled States, but from my own neighborhood as well, to the belief that, on the whole, we should attempt to have this matter of fees stopped, which are taken out of the poor very largely.

At the present session of Congress I went to work upon the subject in person. A subcommittee was appointed, consisting of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], himself an experienced official of the United States, formerly district attorney, and we prepared very carefully two bills, going over this whole matter. We got them ready, and they are now in the Senate reported as separate bills. But about the time we were ready to report them, we found the House of Representatives had put this scheme into an appropriation bill, and therefore we turned over the result of our labors, whatever it was, to the Committee on Appropriations. After considering it that committee have reported what is found here. You have got to have extraordinary and occasional services for extraordinary crimes requiring to be detected and punished, and there are extraordinary civil commotions; there are offenses against the internal and the external revenue laws, which require to be followed up. You can not get along with a man who is paid a salary and be sure of faithful and efficient and vigorous execution of the law. A man who is to get his $2,000 a year will very much prefer to sit upon his own veranda on a summer's night than to go in pursuit of a moonshiner where a bullet may strike him from a thicket. A man in New England would very much prefer to sit by his own fireside of a winter's night than to go somewhere on that ice-bound coast and pursue a smuggler.

Therefore it became necessary to combine to some limited and careful extent the fee system with the salary system in regard to deputy marshals. The deputy marshals are put on a salary and all temptation to increase their business is removed. The district attorney is put on a salary and all temptation to him to make business for the sake of making money is removed. Having accomplished so much, the bill provides that in regard to commissioners and clerks there shall be a scheme submitted to the Senate next winter. These two, we thought, were as much as could be attended to at this time.

The scheme in regard to deputy marshals is substantially the same scheme that came from the House. The marshal must have somebody in his office. That person is made a deputy rather than a clerk, because if a marshal is out you want a man who can serve a writ himself, who has the marshal's power. If you send him to attend in court you want a man who has the duty of an officer to arrest a disorderly person in court. Therefore, he is styled an office deputy and put with the clerical assistance. They can not be paid by fees in any way, and therefore somebody must fix their salaries.

Then, for the ordinary outdoor service, to go over a State which extends several hundred miles you want men in different parts of the State for United States processes, to serve civil processes. The bill provides that there shall be field deputies appointed by the marshal, but those field deputies shall in no case get more than $2,400 a year each—at that rate for any part of a year—and shall in no case get more than three-fourths of what they earn. So of what they get from civil or from criminal cases, a quarter of what they earn at least will go into the United States Treasury.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if this bill does not increase, or authorize an increase of, the marshal's force?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; the power of appointing deputy marshals under the Revised Statutes is absolutely unlimited. Is not that the case?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will read the section which provides for the clerks and deputy marshals and how they may be paid. It is in excess of the amount received by marshals over $6,000 expressly provided in section 841.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly.

Mr. FAULKNER. Section 841 provides that—

> No marshal shall be allowed by the Attorney-General, except as provided in the next section, to retain of the fees and emoluments which he is required to include in his semiannual return, as aforesaid, for his personal compensation, over and above the necessary expenses of his office, including necessary clerk hire, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and a proper allowance to his deputies, any sum exceeding $6,000 a year.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly.

Mr. FAULKNER. So that all these office expenses are included under the present law as an allowance over and above the $6,000, to be taken out of the emoluments that are returned.

Mr. ALLEN. That does not answer the question at all.

Mr. HOAR. I think it does.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to finish the statement first, and then I will answer any question I can.

The Senator from Nebraska said a little while ago, in speaking of the district attorneys, that this bill increases the public expenditures. He took a few cases where the returns are large, like in your State, I think [Mr. PERKINS in the chair], where the district attorney has argued within the year, among other things, the great case of the claim against the Leland Stanford property. The idea of measuring the proper compensation to a person who has such duties by looking to see how much taxable costs of travel and attendance go out of the little petty cases in the office has no connection with it whatever.

But, to come back to what I was saying, the bill very largely diminishes the expense to the United States, because in a great many of these districts, as is shown by the bill which was prepared here for the use of the committee, where the district attorney is to have a salary of $5,000, the fees run up to $18,000 or $15,000 or some other large sum, and the salary might in all those cases go up to $6,000. So we are making a great diminution of the cost to the United States.

The Senator from Nebraska spent a good deal of time in his last speech in criticising the proposition that the salaries for the offices of deputies and clerks are left to the Attorney-General to fix. He says that the Judiciary Committee ought to fix them, and he said in his other speech, where the Judiciary Committee or the Appropriations Committee had fixed them, that the Senate ought not to take them, as we were doing, at the recommendation of the committee, but ought to consider them itself, and that every Senator is responsible.

Now, then, here are 77 districts in the United States. They are constantly changing in their demands and their wants and their needs. Some of them are growing, in some few of them the business is growing less, and the Senator from Nebraska thinks that in addition to the other public business, involving all the great questions of war and peace and foreign commerce and post-offices and internal commerce and jurisprudence, which the Senate of the United States has to do, in the first place the Judiciary Committee, consisting of 13 Senators, should inquire in every one of the 77 districts what is a fit and proper sum for clerk hire in the marshals' offices; that it should then bring that into the Senate, should discuss it in the presence of 90 Senators, and each one of them should make up his individual opinion about it and debate it; and that has got to be done every year, because this matter is so constantly changing that the judgment for one year might not apply for the next, and when we have done that, then he thinks the House of Representatives should go through the same thing. Of course, the 370 members, or whatever is the number, of the House of Representatives are on oath and have their own conscience and judgment, and he thinks it is not only unrepublican, but unconstitutional, that we should decline to go into that question. I venture to say that to do that single thing without trusting somebody other than the individual Senator would take six months of the twelve months at least for the two Houses of Congress. Now, this world is not run in that way.

Mr. ALLEN. It ought to be, I think.

Mr. HOAR. The American Government is not run in that way, and never will be, and never ought to be. If we were to undertake to do what the Senator from Nebraska suggests, we should be deservedly the laughing stock of the American people and of mankind. If we can not take the head of the legal profession of the United States and trust him with the question of saying how many office deputies are needed in the 77 districts of the United States, how much they ought to be paid, I think republican government better shut up shop, and we had better apply either to the Emperor of Russia or to the head of some Populist club and take him for a despot.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the only really sensible thing that has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts was his last remark, that it would be wise to apply to some Populist club for information as to the course that should be pursued in running this Government. I fully agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the most sensible thing that could be done at this time would be either to have this portion of the bill recommitted and sent back to the Judiciary Committee and have them discharge their duty with reference to it or to refer it to some Populist club who have the ability and the disposition to properly consider and properly report it. The Senator from Massachusetts does not tread upon my toes at all by his cynical reference to the Populist party or to a Populist club. If the Populist party had shown the utter lack of common sense in the administration of the affairs of the Government that has been shown by the Republican party, it would be justly subject to criticism and justly subject to the universal contempt of the people.

The Senator from Massachusetts gravely informs the Senate (and I suppose he intended to inform me more particularly as one of the ignorant Senators here) that this country had never been run upon the order that I have suggested; that, in other words, Congress has always been in the habit of turning over these matters to the heads of Departments.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska if the Attorney-General is not as capable of fixing the compensation of deputy marshals, if they are needed, as he is to fix the compensation of assistant district attorneys, which the Attorney-General has done for many years, and I have never heard of any abuse under it?

Mr. ALLEN. That may all be true, but that is to no purpose whatever in the argument. I object seriously to turning over the legislative branch of this Government to any Department of the executive branch. The learned Senator from Massachusetts discovers something that is really amusing to him in the position I took that it is unconstitutional to do so. I challenge the Senator from Massachusetts to point to a single word in the history of English jurisprudence and in the history of the United States especially, where we have these republican forms of government, that authorizes one department to usurp and discharge the duties of another.

I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, although he is my superior in ability and in years and in experience, that taking his own State and the 44 other States of this Union he can not find a solitary decision that authorizes the legislative department of the Government to turn over the power of legislation to the judicial or to the executive department. It is not a thing to be sneered at. It is not a thing to be laughed at. The Senator understands, if he understands these things, that there is not a court of last resort in the United States which has not held at least once, and in some instances repeatedly, that the power to legislate which is by the Constitution committed to the legislative department of the Government can not be abdicated or abandoned or turned over to another department. Yet this is something that savors of Populism, so the Senator from Massachusetts would say, and therefore, per consequence, the subject of jest and sport.

The Senator from Massachusetts says again that having some 77 different judicial districts in the United States, it would be impossible for Congress to inform itself upon the precise conditions of each district and therefore to formulate and pass legislation adapted to each district. Why impossible? Has the Senator from Massachusetts offered one reason why that would be impossible? Nothing, Mr. President, whatever has been offered by him except his mere ipse dixit.

Mr. President, every State in this Union is represented in this Chamber by two Senators with the exception of one and that is not so big but that the one who is here can represent it properly. Every State in this Union is represented by members in the other branch of Congress. How difficult would it be for the Senators representing the different States and the members of the lower House representing the different districts in the different States to gather up the information necessary to enable the judiciary committee of each House to form an enlightened judgment and an accurate opinion upon this subject so as to enable them to present the proper bill? It is not difficult at all.

The Senator from Massachusetts says we would be the just subject of ridicule upon the part of the civilized world if we should attempt it. Mr. President, I would rather be the subject of ridicule upon all that part of the civilized world that would heap upon us ridicule for discharging our constitutional and our sworn duties than to be the recipient of their smiles and their favors. I would rather invite their criticism, sir, than to invite the just condemnation of the honest people of this country throughout its length and breadth for an impotent if not a willful failure to discharge our sworn duties.

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose anyone will take issue with the Senator from Nebraska that the legislative department should not be invaded by the executive, but if the Senator means to say that when we allow the head of a Department to determine the amount of salary a clerk shall receive, he is very much mistaken in saying that that is an invasion of the legislative department.

Mr. ALLEN. I say, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me, that the authorizing of the executive department of the Government to increase the number of officers in this country is legislation.

Mr. TELLER. For very many years, if the Senator will take the pains to look, he will find that the appropriations were made in a lump, so to speak, for the Departments. Long since I have been a member of this body it has been to a large extent true that the head of a Department would determine how many men he would employ and the salary he would pay to them. I admit it was not a good practice, but it grew.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me right at that point——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I know he states the facts exactly as they are. It is a fault that I find with that system of business and that I would change at this time.

Mr. TELLER. In the early days the men who made the Republic, I may say, and the Constitution did not think that was such a serious violation of the Constitution. For very many years that practice existed. They never thought of making an appropriation for so many clerks of the first class, and so many of the second class, and so on. This does not enlarge in the slightest degree the power of the marshal. It simply puts a check upon the marshal by allowing the head of the Department, the Attorney-General, who has control of the marshals to a large extent, to check their excessive and sometimes extravagant appointment of deputy marshals. It does not change the law except that there is now a check upon the marshal by the auditing officer. Now there will be another check upon him by the head of the Department.

Mr. ALLEN. It permits an increase of officers by the head of the Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section [12] 10, page 124, line 23, after the word "deputy" to insert "and shall hold office during the pleasure of the marshal, except as hereinafter provided"; so as to read:

That at any time when, in the opinion of the marshal of any district, the public interest will thereby be promoted, he may appoint one or more deputy marshals for such district, who shall be known as field deputies, and shall hold office during the pleasure of the marshal, except as hereinafter provided, and who shall each, as his compensation, receive three-fourths of the gross fees, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the words "three-fourths of the gross," in line 1, page 125, and insert, in line 6, page 125, after the word "arrest," the words "where no arrest is made."

Mr. TELLER. I do not quite understand what the Senator's idea is. I understand this three-fourths of the gross fees is a limit upon the total amount that he shall receive for the yearly compensation. There are two limits put on it. He shall not get more than three-fourths of the gross fees nor more than $2,400.

Mr. CULLOM. In any event.

Mr. TELLER. In any event.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee, in line 23. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "deputies," in line 23, page 124, the committee report to insert:

And shall hold office during the pleasure of the marshal, except as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Auditor suggested the amendment I have moved and also another one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the committee accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have it stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will let it pass, except after the word "arrest," in line 6, page 125, I move to insert "where no arrest is made."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment in line 1 will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "fees," in line 1, page 125, the committee report to insert "including mileage."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri in line 6 will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. There is objection. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Missouri. I see what he wants to get at; but suppose a murderer comes into his office and surrenders himself; he arrests him; there is no fee at all except the mere fee for the service of the capias; but he has spent perhaps a month in endeavoring to arrest that man; he has spent his whole time in the last month to find that murderer. This is not in construction; it is only what he pays out that he is allowed. At the same time I see he does not want to get constructive expenses and actual expenses, too. I think the Senator had better let that go by until we get into the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will pass it by, because I am going to move to strike it all out.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I see there is something which ought to be accomplished which the Senator proposes to accomplish, but at the same time I think the phraseology of his amendment goes further than he means to go.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will withdraw both of the amendments, and then will move to strike out the whole section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 125, line 9, after the word "mileage," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That in special cases, where in his judgment justice requires, the Attorney-General may make an additional allowance, not, however, in any case to make the aggregate annual compensation of any field deputy in excess of $2,500 nor more than three-fourths of the gross fees earned by such field deputy, and he shall hold his office during the pleasure of the marshal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of section [12] 10.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I move to strike out the section, unless the Senator from Colorado wants to move an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. I want to move an amendment. What does the Senator wish to strike out?

Mr. COCKRELL. I propose to move to strike out the whole of section 10 and insert a substitute.

Mr. TELLER. Have you the substitute ready?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have.

Mr. TELLER. All right.

Mr. COCKRELL. I propose the following:

SEC. 10. That in addition to the office deputies above provided for—the United States marshal in each district may appoint such number of field deputies as the judge of said district, with the concurrence of the Attorney-General, shall consider necessary for transacting the business of said district, and said deputies shall receive for compensation salaries at the rate of $1,000 per annum, together with the actual and necessary expenses of traveling and subsistence while away from their places of residence on official business, the correctness of their vouchers therefor to be certified by the affidavits of the field marshal and approved by the marshal and the district attorney.

That is, in section 9—

That changes the deputy marshals from feed officers to a fixed salary and no fees.

Mr. HOAR. That has been the subject of more anxious consideration in regard to the solving of this problem, both by the Attorney-General and in the Senate, than any other single clause in the bill. I suppose we shall not get the bill through the Senate to-night. I wish the Senator would have the amendment printed and let it go over and offer it in the Senate to-morrow, so that we can look at it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to say that the amendment has been prepared by the Auditor of the State Department, who has given a great deal of attention to this matter, and he thinks that unless the fee system is stopped entirely it will not work the good we expect, and that is also the opinion of experienced persons in the office.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the Attorney-General's Office, which is certainly quite as high authority as that of a mere accounting officer——

Mr. COCKRELL. I meant to say the Auditor for the Department of Justice.

Mr. HOAR. I dare say it may be all right; but I wish the Senator would let the amendment be printed and let us look at it.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest to the Senator whether the salary of a thousand dollars a year for a deputy is not rather small. It seems to me it ought to be larger.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to make a statement. I wish to state that the deputy marshals in the Indian Territory of the courts in the Territory, not at Fort Smith or Paris, were put upon a salary during the last Congress of $1,200 each. I state further that I was shown at the Attorney-General's Office the expenses under the two systems for six months, and that 45 deputies under the salary system at $1,200 each cost the Government more in six months than 200 deputies cost under the fee system. The figures were given me, and I put them in the RECORD in the former discussion of this subject, as will be shown, that I received from the Attorney-General's Office. I was informed by the office there that in the matter of the field deputies in the Indian Territory (and especially would that be so if they had had jurisdiction of felony cases), if the necessary number of deputies should be appointed to enforce the laws there it would cost far more, doubly more, under a salary system for field deputies at $1,200 each than under the present fee system. That is the information I received from the Attorney-General's Office; and I will state——

Mr. VEST. Let me ask the Senator from Arkansas a question.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I ask if that includes the fees which are increased before the commissioners under the fee system when it applies to marshals; in other words, what you might call the indirect fees?

Mr. BERRY. The commissioners' fees were not in question. The figures that I received from the Attorney-General's Office applied to deputy marshals in the Indian Territory, those courts having only jurisdiction, as the Senator knows, of misdemeanor cases, the felony jurisdiction yet remaining at Paris and Fort Smith. The statement given me at the Attorney-General's Office was that 45 deputies, at a salary of $1,200, cost more than 200 deputies cost under the fee system of the present law, and that, as I stated before, with those courts having jurisdiction only of misdemeanor causes. If it did include the felony jurisdiction, which now remains at Fort Smith and Paris, it is absolutely impossible to enforce the law there with salaried deputies who ride in the field without a cost that is almost beyond computation larger than the present; that so far exceeds it that the Government could not and would not pay the additional sum which deputy marshals there on a salary would cost.

Mr. TELLER. I ask to go back to page 121.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Missouri not to press his amendment at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer this amendment, and in this connection I desire to say that I would not want it to apply to the Indian Territory, for that is not a normal condition. There posses—a large number of deputies—have to go, which would not be the case in the older States, where everything is better organized. As a matter of course, there have been bands of robbers and ruffians there, and it would take a large number to go, but it would not be so in Missouri; it would not be so in the States.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withdraw his motion to amend in order to give notice that he will offer it to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well; I give notice that I will offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Missouri will have leave to withdraw his amendment, and he gives notice that the same will be offered when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to turn back and correct an error on page 121. At the top of the page, for the district marshal for the northern district of California we have it $4,500. It should be $5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The next amendment which was passed over will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 125, after line 22, to strike out:

That said marshal, when attending court at any place other than his official residence and when engaged in the service of any process, writ, or subpœna, shall be paid his actual and necessary expenses for subsistence and travel while so necessarily employed, the same as the district attorneys, and an account of the same shall be made out and paid as hereinafter provided.

And insert:

That the marshal, when attending court at any place other than his official residence, and when engaged in the service or attempted service of any process, writ, or subpœna, and when otherwise necessarily absent from his official residence on official business, shall be allowed his necessary expenses for lodging and subsistence, not exceeding $4 per day and his actual necessary traveling expenses. He shall also be allowed the actual necessary expenses in transporting prisoners, including necessary guard hire. An account of such expenses shall be made out and paid as hereinafter provided.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. That the marshal, when attending court at any place other than his official residence, and when engaged in the service or attempted service of any process, writ, or subpœna, and when otherwise necessarily absent from his official residence on official business, shall be allowed his necessary expenses for lodging and subsistence, not exceeding $4 per day and his actual necessary traveling expenses. He shall also be allowed the actual necessary expenses in transporting prisoners, including necessary guard hire. An account of such expenses shall be made out and paid as hereinafter provided. The marshal's official residence shall be deemed to be at one of the places of holding court in the district, and the Attorney-General shall be authorized to fix and declare the place of such official residence.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado why it is that the expense for lodging and subsistence is made $2 a day on page 124 and $4 a day here?

Mr. TELLER. One is for the deputies and the other is for the marshals.

Mr. HOAR. Do you expect marshals to have a breakfast twice as good as deputies?

Mr. TELLER. The Attorney-General thought it ought to be this way, and we put it in to suit him. We ought to raise the other.

Mr. HOAR. I think the other is too small.

Mr. TELLER. I think it is.

Mr. HOAR. I move to go back and make the other $3 instead of $2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the pending amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now I ask to go back to page 124, line 16, and I move to strike out the word "two" before "dollars" and insert "three"; so as to read:

Shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $3 per day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section [14] 12, on page 127, line 6, after the word "law," to insert:

Each marshal shall make such returns of the earnings and expenses of office as shall be required under rules and regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General: Provided, That no office or field deputy shall receive compensation as bailiff, and no field deputy shall represent or receive fees for representing the marshal in court;

So as to make the clause read:

SEC. 12. That whenever in this act an officer is allowed actual expenses the account therefor shall be made out quarterly, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General. When made out the account shall be verified on oath before an officer authorized to administer oaths.

The expense accounts of the marshals and their office deputies and the accounts of the field deputies shall be paid by the marshals; said accounts and the expense accounts of the district attorneys and their assistants when made out in accordance with this act shall be submitted to and examined by the circuit court or district court of the district, and when approved by the court shall be audited and allowed as now provided by law. Each marshal shall make such returns of the earnings and expenses of his office as shall be required under rules and regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General: Provided, That no office or field deputy shall receive compensation as bailiff, and no field deputy shall represent or receive fees for representing the marshal in court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 22, after the word "by," to insert "sections 5 to 14, inclusive, of"; so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 15. That all salaries provided by sections 5 to 14, inclusive, of this act shall be paid monthly by the Department of Justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 127, line 25, after the word "That," to strike out "the foregoing," and in the same line, after the word "sections," to insert "5 to 14, inclusive," and on page 128, line 2, after the word "amount," to strike out "of"; so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 16. That sections 5 to 14, inclusive, of this act shall not be so construed as to prevent or affect the amount or taxation of costs against the unsuccessful party in civil proceedings or against defendants convicted of crimes or misdemeanors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, line 6, after the word "by," to insert "sections 5 to 14, inclusive"; so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 17. That any officer whose compensation is fixed by sections 5 to 14, inclusive, of this act who shall directly or indirectly demand, receive, or accept any fee or compensation for the performance of any official service other than is herein provided, or shall willfully fail or neglect to account for or pay over to the proper officer any fee received or collected by him, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 128, after line 15, to strike out:

SEC. 20. That the terms of office of all commissioners of the circuit courts heretofore appointed shall expire on the 30th day of June, 1896; and it shall be the duty of the district judge of each judicial district to appoint such number of persons, to be known as United States commissioners, at such places in the district as may be designated by the Attorney-General, which United States commissioners shall have the same powers and perform the same duties as are now imposed upon commissioners of the circuit courts. The appointment of such United States commissioners shall be entered of record in the district courts and notice thereof at once given by the clerk to the Attorney-General. That such United States commissioners shall hold their offices, respectively, for the term of four years, but they shall be at any time subject to removal by the district judge; and no person shall at any time be a clerk of a United States court and a United States commissioner: Provided, That all acts and parts of acts applicable to commissioners of the circuit courts, except as to appointment and fees, shall be applicable to United States commissioners appointed under this act.

Warrants of arrest for violations of internal-revenue laws may be issued by United States commissioners upon the sworn complaint of a United States district attorney, assistant United States district attorney, collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, or revenue agent or private citizen, but no such warrant of arrest shall be issued upon the sworn complaint of a private citizen unless first approved in writing by a United States district attorney.

That United States commissioners are hereby authorized to administer oaths.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 129, after line 21, to strike out:

SEC. 21. That no marshal or deputy marshal, clerk, or deputy clerk of the circuit or district court, attorney or assistant attorney of any district, jury commissioner, clerk of marshal, no bailiff, crier, juror, janitor of any Government building, nor any civil or military employee of the Government, and no clerk or employee of any United States justice or judge shall have, hold, or exercise the duties of the United States commissioner. And it shall not be lawful to appoint any of the officers named in this section receiver or receivers in any case or cases now pending or that may be hereafter brought in the courts of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 130, after line 8, to strike out:

SEC. 22. That each United States commissioner shall be entitled to the following-named fees, and none other: Drawing a complaint, with oath and jurat to same, 50 cents; copy of complaint, with certificate to same, 30 cents; issuing warrant of arrest, 75 cents; issuing a commitment and making copy of same, $1; entering a return, 15 cents; issuing subpœna or subpœnas in any one case, with 5 cents for each necessary witness in addition to the first, 25 cents; drawing a bond of defendant and sureties, taking acknowledgment of same and justification of sureties, 75 cents; for administering an oath (except to witness as to attendance and travel), 10 cents; recognizance of all witnesses in a case, when the defendant or defendants are held for court, 50 cents; transcripts of proceedings, when required by order of court, and transmission of original papers to court, 60 cents; copy of warrant of arrest, with certificate to same, when defendant is held for court, and the original papers are not sent to court, 40 cents; order in duplicate to pay all witnesses in a case—for first witness, 30 cents, and for each additional witness, 5 cents, and for oath to each witness as to attendance and travel, 5 cents; for hearing and deciding on criminal charges and reducing the testimony to writing when required by law or order of court, $5 a day for the time necessarily employed: Provided, That not more than one per diem shall be allowed in a case unless the account shall show that the hearing could not be completed in one day, when one additional per diem may be specially approved and allowed by the court: Provided further, That not more than one per diem shall be allowed for any one day: Provided further, That no per diem shall be allowed for taking a bond or recognizance and passing on the sufficiency of the bond or recognizance and the sureties thereon when the bond or recognizance was taken after the defendant had been committed to prison upon a final commitment, or has given bond or been recognized for his appearance at court, or when the defendant has been arrested on a capias or bench warrant, or was in custody under any process or order of a court of record. For the examination and certificate in cases of application for discharge of poor convicts imprisoned for nonpayment of fine or fine and costs, and all services connected therewith, $1.50; for attending to a reference in a litigated matter in a civil cause at law, in equity, or in admiralty, in pursuance of an order of the court, $3 a day; for taking and certifying depositions to file in civil cases, 10 cents for each folio; for each copy of the same furnished to a party on request, 10 cents for each folio; for issuing any warrant under the tenth article of the treaty of August 9, 1842, between the United States and the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, against any parties charged with any crime or offense set forth in said article, $2; for issuing any warrant under the provision of the convention for the surrender of criminals between the United States and the King of the French, concluded at Washington, November 9, 1843, $2; for hearing and deciding upon the case of any person charged with any crime or offense, and arrested under the provisions of said treaty or of said convention, $3 a day for the time necessarily employed.

Such commissioners shall keep a complete record of all proceedings before them in criminal cases, in a well-bound book, which record book shall be delivered to and preserved by the clerk of the district court for such district on the death, resignation, removal, or expiration of term of the commissioner, for which record the commissioner shall receive no compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 18. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to make an investigation as respects the compensation to be paid, by salary or otherwise, to clerks of United States circuit and district courts, as also the proper compensation to United States commissioners; and he shall report on the first day of the next session of the present Congress a plan for fixing such compensation for the clerks and commissioners of the several courts of the United States as he may deem just, and he shall also recommend with his report such provisions as may to him seem proper touching their appointment and the performance of their duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, line 6, after the word "sections," to strike out "7 to 23" and insert "5 to 19"; in line 11, after the word "sections," to strike out "7, 9, or 16" and insert "5, 7, or 14"; and in line 14, after the words "New York," to insert "or for the District of Columbia"; so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 20. That all acts and portions of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed; Provided, That none of the provisions of sections 5 to 19, both inclusive, of this act shall apply to the Indian Territory or Territory of Alaska, and said sections shall take effect and be in force on and after June 30, 1896: Provided further, That none of the provisions of sections 5, 7, or 14 of this act shall apply to the office of the United States district attorney and his assistants for the southern district of New York, or for the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. The succeeding sections were read yesterdya and corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to move an amendment. I desire to move it to-night, but I will wait until the Senator from Illinois is through.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the court provisions are not quite disposed of yet.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to know whether the Senator from Missouri proposes to call up his amendment now?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection, if the Senate desires to act upon it.

Mr. TELLER. I think we might as well act upon it.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be allowed a moment, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri makes a limitation, so that in no case can any United States deputy marshal get more than a thousand dollars a year anywhere. It seems to me that is too small a compensation. These are men who are armed with the authority of the United States in time of great civil commotion, and in very important affairs always, whether there is civil commotion or not. There are a great many cases where one United States court is being held, the court of appeals or the circuit court, or the district court at one place, and one or more other courts at another place within the same circuit; not often within the same district, I agree, but occasionally there will be two courts within the same district.

Mr. TELLER. Sometimes that is the case.

Mr. HOAR. The marshal is at one and there must be a deputy competent to take care of the court and preserve order at the other. You can not get in my part of the country certainly a thousand-dollar man who would be likely to be a suitable person. You would have to go down into the region of poorly paid men. They are also men who must be expected to be men of courage, of principle, and integrity. They have to take their lives in their hands sometimes.

I suggest to the Senator to make his limitation $2,000 and let it go into conference, instead of $1,000. It was $2,400 in the bill as the Committee on Appropriations fixed it. I would not ask any delay, but I certainly should feel it my duty to resist if it is to be put at $1,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator just to hear me for a moment. Section 9 of the bill is in the following words:

That when in the opinion of the Attorney-General the public interest requires it, he may, on the recommendation of the marshal, which recommendation shall state the facts as distinguished from conclusions, showing necessity for the same, allow the marshals to employ necessary office deputies and clerical assistance——

Mr. HOAR. "Office deputies."

upon salaries to be fixed by the Attorney-General, from time to time, and paid as hereinafter provided. When any of such office deputies is engaged in the service or attempted service of any writ, process, or subpœna, or when necessarily absent from the place of his regular employment, on official business, he shall be allowed his actual traveling expenses only, and his necessary and actual expenses for lodging and subsistence, not to exceed $3 per day, and the necessary actual expenses in transporting prisoners, including necessary guard hire; and he shall make and render accounts thereof as hereinafter provided.

There the deputies will perform a kind of duty to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers, and the Attorney-General will fix their compensation.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me at that point, if he is right, that is a good answer to a part of my argument, but I do not understand that to be the purpose of this provision. I understand these men are to be office deputies, and the suggestion was made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] that they ought to be called clerks and not deputies. They are office deputies, clerical assistants. They are intended to be men who will keep the marshal's accounts and be in the office when he is out of it, and it was thought expedient that they should be clothed with the function of deputy marshals.

It was not, however, expected that they would ordinarily serve writs or attempt to serve writs, but they will have the power to do it, as they are made deputies. It was provided, although they are salaried officers, that they should get, in addition to their ordinary salary, the payment of their expenses. The idea of the bill, however, is that the deputy marshals, who are known as field deputies, are to do the work of serving writs ordinarily. For instance, in a large district where there are two or three places of holding court, as in the case of Iowa, which has been spoken of, and in New Hampshire, I think, there are two or three places of holding court, though that is a small State territorially, the marshal will expect to have one of these field deputies in one of these places of holding court where he does not reside himself, and another in another place. They are men, as I understand, who are expected to do the ordinary work of a deputy marshal.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the bill contemplates very differently. This bill contemplates that there shall be office deputies; and they have the right to, and the bill expressly provides that they shall, perform any duty; that they shall go on official business, and that when on official business they shall receive mileage and per diem traveling expenses. Then the field deputy is to be officially disconnected, as I understand, from the office deputy. The office deputies will attend all the courts—for instance, in Boston, in New York, in Chicago, in St. Louis, or wherever it may be. It will be an office deputy who will attend the courts and transact the marshal's business in the courts. The field deputies will be out in the service of process, and it will not require the same class of persons as are required to be present in court and to make arrests.

I have no idea that a field marshal would be appointed under this bill for the city of Boston. The office deputies would serve the process right there. That is my idea of the theory of this provision, and therefore I have offered this amendment. I think that $1,200, or probably $1,500, would not be any too much.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will make the amount $1,500, I will not delay the bill by a discussion on a difference of $500 a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to making the amount $1,500.

Mr. HOAR. It will all be in conference, in any event, where it can be properly arranged.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, I know. Let the amount be changed to $1,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified, and will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 10, on pages 124 and 125, and insert:

SEC. 10. That in addition to the office deputies above provided for the United States marshal in each district may appoint such number of field deputies as the judge of said district, with the concurrence of the Attorney-General, shall consider necessary for transacting the business of the said district, and said deputies shall receive for compensation salaries at the rate of $1,500 per annum, together with actual necessary expenses of travel and subsistence while away from their places of residence on official business, the correctness of the vouchers therefor to be certified by the affidavit of the field marshal and approved by the marshal and the district court.

Mr. TELLER. We will accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to add to the amendment which has just been adopted on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment just adopted it is proposed to add:

Provided, That the clerks of the circuit and district courts, and the field deputies herein provided for the districts of California, Washington, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nevada, Oregon, and Idaho, shall, for the services they may perform during the fiscal year 1897, receive double the fees allowed by law to like officers in other States for performing similar duties, but neither of them shall be allowed to receive of such fees any sum exceeding the aggregate compensation of such officer as provided by law.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to modify the amendment by inserting "Colorado" after "California." Colorado is provided for in the existing statute, and I thought it was in the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. How about Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. Wyoming is also in the present law, and it should be included in the amendment. Wyoming is in the section of country where such provision is made by existing law, and as the Government is likely to get the fees, I do not think there can be any objection to including it. I modify the amendment further by inserting "Wyoming" after "Oregon."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to modify his amendment. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted at the end of line 7, on page 109.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 7, on page 109, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That in the ninth judicial circuit, in addition to the term or terms held in San Francisco, two terms of the circuit court of appeals shall be held each year in two other places in said circuit, to be designated by the judges of said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will consent now to an executive session?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to propose two or three little amendments on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, and then I shall yield.

On page 79, in line 7, I move to strike out the words "bookkeeper for custodian, $1,200"; and in line 9, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 79, in lines 7 and 8, it is proposed to strike out "bookkeeper for custodian, $1,200"; and in line 9, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-five"; so as to read:

Twenty-five clerks of class 1, two of whom shall be stenographers or typewriters.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 75, in line 11, I move to strike out the words "one copyist" and to insert "one clerk of class 1."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 75, in line 11, in the appropriations for the Naval Observatory, it is proposed to strike out "one copyist" and to insert "one clerk of class 1."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. At the end of that paragraph I move to change the total so that it will read "$37,460" instead of "$37,160."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. On page 12, in lines 7 and 8, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment reported by the committee, so that it may stand as the House fixed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the appropriations for "Office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives," on page 12, line 7, after the word "laborer," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out "one thousand" and inserted "eight hundred"; so as to read:

Laborer, $800.

Mr. CULLOM. It is proposed to disagree to that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOM. At the end of that paragraph I move to disagree to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, in line 10, before the word "hundred," striking out "six" and inserting "four"; so that the total may stand as the bill came from the other House, "$16,680."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. VILAS. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he wishes his amendment considered to-night?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do. I wish to expedite the business of the Senate to-morrow by going away. [Laughter.] So I should like to have the amendment considered now.

Mr. VILAS. We all agree, without a word. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, after line 24, it is proposed to insert:

For printing, binding, and wrapping 1,000 additional copies of series 1, volumes 1, 2, 3, and 4, for supplying officers of the Navy who have not yet received the work, $2,400; and for the expense of a board of publication to conduct the preparation of such records, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, one member to be an officer of the Navy and the other two members to be civilian experts, whose compensation shall be fixed by the Secretary and paid from this appropriation, and for other expert services in compiling, publishing, and distributing the records, $11,600.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire if that amendment is reported from any standing committee?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is. The original estimate was $50,000. It was cut down to $18,000 in the House of Representatives, and this is an addition of about $10,000 for a thousand extra copies and for expediting the publication. The amount is far less now than the estimate, and it is moved by direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Here is the letter of the Secretary of the Navy recommending the full amount of $50,000, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 20, 1896.

SIR: Referring to the committee's communication of the 12th instant, inclosing a copy of an "Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CHANDLER to the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes," and requesting to be advised as to the views of the Department in regard thereto, I have the honor to state that said amendment serves to carry out the recommendation made in the report of the Secretary of the Navy for the year 1895 relative to the publication of the Naval War Records, and that made by the superintendent of the Naval War Records in his report for the same year. The Department recommends, therefore, that the amendment in question receive the favorable consideration of the committee.

Very respectfully, W. MCADOO, Acting Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. As we have a prospect of the Senator leaving the Senate for a while, I shall not take up time in opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. VILAS. Several Senators desire to offer amendments.

Mr. CALL. I merely desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. VILAS. Very well.

Mr. CALL. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to a paper from the Treasury Department relating to the steam engineering service, which I gave to him with a request on the part of that Bureau to move for a change in the bill. I merely call the attention of the Senator to that fact so that it may be attended to before the bill passes into the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator can offer his amendment in the Senate after the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole. I really do not know where I laid the paper which the Senator states he handed to me.

Mr. CALL. I will submit an amendment which I intend to offer.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin and those who desire to make an effort to strike the court provisions out of the bill, whether they would not agree that that motion and the discussion upon it should take place in the Senate, instead of in Committee of the Whole, so that the bill may be reported to the Senate for consideration? The bill will still be open for amendment in the Senate, as every Senator knows, and I should be very glad if we could get the bill out of committee to-night.

Mr. HILL. I assume that the same rights will pertain to the bill in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. HILL. With all rights reserved, I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CALL. I give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole under the head of "Department of State," beginning on page 22, line 21, down to and including line 9 on page 23, relative to the employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. All amendments will be reserved.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] has been very anxious to offer an amendment.

Mr. VILAS. I withhold the motion for an executive session until the Senator from Oregon can offer his amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope he may have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment and ask that it be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Florida will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I now renew my motion to amend in line 13 on page 96, as directed by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLATT. I hope that the amendment of the Senator will be agreed to, because yesterday I suggested that a point of order would lie against it, as it was a little more than the estimate; but I am satisfied the point of order does not lie, because a report has been made regarding it.

Mr. CULLOM. The fact is, that the Senator from Oregon has produced a letter from the Department on the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read, so that we may understand it.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I move to amend the amendment which was adopted yesterday by which "$6,700" was inserted, in line 13 on page 96, by striking out that sum and inserting "$8,000."

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I sincerely hope that the amendment proposed by my colleague will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment heretofore adopted by striking out "$6,700" and inserting "$8,000"; so as to read:

For surveyor-general of Oregon, $2,000; and for the clerks in his office, $8,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I consent to the amendment so far as I am individually concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. The total ought to be changed to correspond with the amendment which has just been made. Let the Secretary correct the total.

Mr. MCBRIDE. Do I understand that the amendment has been made in line 14, so as to change the total to correspond with the amendment which has just been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to change the total in line 14 by striking out "$8,700" and inserting "$10,000"; so as to read:

In all, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I give notice of an amendment I propose to offer in relation to the salaries of committee clerks on pages 4 and 5.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will have an opportunity to do that after the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VILAS. There are some reservations to be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. All the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole should not be now concurred in.

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to except the court provisions and those provisions about which there is controversy.

Mr. HILL. There are some other motions to be made to strike out.

Mr. COCKRELL. They had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. VILAS. I move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. Before that is done, we should have an understanding.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have an understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 26, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Daniel H. Brooks, to be postmaster at Bozeman, in the county of Gallatin and State of Montana.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 25, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following joint resolution and bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 104) directing the Secretary of War to transmit to Congress a report on survey of the waterway connecting the waters of Puget Sound at Salmon Bay with Lakes Union and Washington, and to submit an estimate of the cost of constructing said waterway—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

A bill (S. 1906) in relation to the pay of Rear-Admiral Roger N. Stembel, retired—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 177) granting a pension to Sophia D. Clendenin—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 644) to refund certain import duties—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1119) granting a pension to Peter Daly—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

In the Washington Post of yesterday an attack was made upon me in connection with a debate which occurred in this House, and the question is therefore privileged. The Post in its column entitled "Capitol Chat" discussed the controversy which arose on the floor of this House between the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], and it went on to state that one of the correspondents, or one of the argus-eyed correspondents, of a newspaper in Mr. GIBSON'S district had discovered the man who had furnished the circular to Mr. SULZER. This writer in the Post then goes on to make this statement:

Direct evidence points to Congressman BARTLETT of New York as the accessory to the fact. He is said to have picked up a copy of the interesting circular in a job printing office in this city where Mr. GIBSON had this prose ode to himself printed.

In other words, this writer accuses me of an act which, to say the least, would be ungentlemanly, and in my opinion would have been dastardly—that is, to enter a printing office and take a circular which did not belong to me, and not having the courage or manhood to make an attack myself to hand it to another gentleman to make an attack. Now, whether this article be strictly libelous or not, I can say that it is a lie. It is absolutely false.

On the afternoon in question I was deprived of the pleasure of listening to the short debate which occurred between the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Tennessee, because, having become somewhat wearied by the long debate on the Bayard question, I went uptown. As a matter of fact, I have never been in a job printing office in the city of Washington. I have never seen the circular in question. I have never known anything whatever of the subject, except from reading the reports of it on the following morning. The only remedy that a member of Congress has in a case such as this is to draw attention to the libel and to denounce the fabricator of the inexcusable falsehood.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 2610) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the use of one-horse cars within the limits of the city of Washington after the 1st day of January, 1893, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1892;

A bill (S. 2609) to amend chapter 341, section 9, of the acts of 1885, so far as the same prescribes the punishment of death for Indians committing the offense of rape;

A bill (S. 1725) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River at the city of Alexandria, La.; and

A bill (S. 923) for the relief of Irving W. Stanton.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged matter. I desire to correct the RECORD. On yesterday, during one of those gusts of fervid enthusiasm which have swept over this House periodically, in which members have seemed to be impartially earnest in declaring war against Great Britain, or against Spain, or in negotiating peace with the Southern Confederacy [laughter], I made a few remarks, during the course of which several gentlemen undertook to give me instruction, of which I probably was in much need, but which, on examination, proves to have been unauthenticated by that basis of fact which is required to make history permanent. At one point I made a statement about the action of the House of Representatives some years ago in relation to the retirement of General Grant, using this language:

My friends the gentlemen on the other side have never hesitated one moment in advocating their side of all these controversies. No man who served in the Confederacy felt at all estopped because he had participated in the rebellion from opposing the putting of General Grant on the retired list.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, can we be informed as to what question is pending?

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the gentleman will permit me to make my statement, he will be informed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia, I suppose, rises for some purpose.

Mr. CRISP. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to ask what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the question of privilege which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is now stating.

Mr. CRISP. What is the question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is listening in order to hear what it is.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point that the gentleman has not stated any question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. He has not stated it, but what the gentleman has said may be preliminary to a statement of the question of privilege. The gentleman from Maine stated that he wished to make a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman can not make a speech preliminary to the statement of his question of privilege. The question of privilege must be stated first and the speech made afterwards.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Maine is proceeding in order.

Mr. CRISP. Of course that settles it!

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I trust that a question of privilege under the rules of this House will be entertained in the present Congress. [Laughter.] I stated distinctly when I took the floor that I rose to a question of privilege for a correction of the RECORD, and I believe I am in my right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes; and if the gentleman from Georgia had paid attention to the proceedings of the House he would have known it and would have been a great deal better employed——

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will confine himself to the question, the Chair having ruled in his favor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, if the Chair will keep gentlemen on the other side from interfering with me, I will take care of myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do as well as he can. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I have just read, and in the same connection:

No gentleman over there so far as I know felt estopped in the slightest degree from acting as a juror in the great case of the Union against Fitz John Porter when he was retired. They voted solidly to put Fitz John Porter on the retired list; they voted solidly that Ulysses S. Grant should not go on that list.

Whereupon the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]——

Mr. WHEELER. Who is always correct. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). Who states that he is always correct, appeared in the aisle with an enormous volume, supposed to be a volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD——

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; and here it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). And proceeded to "correct" me in this wise:

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman please tell us the name of one man who voted against the passage of that bill for Ulysses S. Grant?

I of course supposed when he said "one man" that he referred to one ex-Confederate, as I had been alluding to those gentlemen, and I said:

They all voted against it.

Then Mr. WHEELER said:

The House voted unanimously for the bill. There was not a single vote against it.

Now, I find in the RECORD this morning that that interesting colloquy is reported in this way. What the gentleman from Alabama did say was:

Will the gentleman please tell us the name of one man who voted against the passage of that bill for Ulysses S. Grant?

The printed RECORD, however, makes him say:

Will the gentleman tell us the names of Democrats who voted against the passage of that bill for Gen. Ulysses S. Grant?

After which I say, as I have already read:

They all voted against it.

Thus I am made to say that all the Democrats voted against it, when I never dreamed of saying anything of the kind, because I knew what I was talking about.

Then the gentleman from Alabama said, as we all heard him say:

The House voted unanimously for the bill. There was not a single vote against it.

But in place of that the RECORD of this morning makes him say:

The gentleman is mistaken; very many Democrats voted for the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me to say just one word?

Mr. BOUTELLE. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman. Let me conclude my statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it is impossible for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be a reliable or useful record of what takes place here if anybody is to be permitted to tamper with it in this way. I have here the official transcript of the reporter's notes, which coincide exactly with my recollection of what took place. The official manuscript, in the original typewriting, contains this:

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman tell us the name of one man who voted against the passage of that bill for Gen. Ulysses S. Grant?

That original report is changed, in pencil, to the form which I have read from the RECORD this morning. The report shows me to have said: "They all voted against it;" meaning all the ex-Confederates. The original report shows the gentleman from Alabama as saying:

The House voted unanimously for the bill. There was not a vote against it.

But instead of that we have this in the RECORD:

The gentleman is mistaken; very many Democrats voted for the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is an absolute injustice to me. It leaves me standing upon nothing, when, as a matter of fact, I was standing upon the records of this House. It is not a true statement, but is absolutely incorrect to say that there were no votes against that bill. On the contrary, the vote upon placing General Grant on the retired list, which was taken on March 3, 1885, discloses 198 yeas and 79 nays.

Mr. OWENS. I rise to a question of order. Upon a question of correcting the RECORD, so as to make it conform to the facts, is it competent to go ahead and discuss the question as to who was correct in the statements which were actually made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the gentleman from Maine have full range to say what he pleases for an hour.

Mr. MILES. I must object to the gentleman having "full range."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the question of fact involved in the statements which were made yesterday is to be discussed again a "full range" might involve remarks by a number of gentlemen. It seems to the Chair that the simple question is on the correctness of the RECORD.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, I am trying to show that the RECORD is not correct; that instead of there being no votes against the bill, 79 members voted against it——

Mr. OWENS. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Among whom were 58 ex-Confederates, who voted in favor of placing Fitz John Porter on the retired list.

The SPEAKER. The object of a correction of the RECORD is to make it conform to what actually took place. It seems that there has been a change in the report as written out. Whether it was changed in accordance with the fact under discussion is not of immediate consequence, the question before the House upon a correction of the RECORD being simply whether it has been changed from what actually occurred.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, Mr. Speaker, what is the usual procedure when it is disclosed in this way that the RECORD has been modified?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the usual course would be to have the RECORD corrected so as to state what took place yesterday. Whether what was said yesterday was a correct statement or not is another question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move, then, that the RECORD be corrected so as to conform to what took place in the House yesterday as reported by the official stenographers.

The SPEAKER. If there is no question as to the fact, the correction will be made as a matter of course. The Chair does not understand that there is objection.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to say a word. The gentleman from Maine has said what he wanted to say.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to say several words.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman told me three times yesterday that he would give me a chance to make the correction, and he did not do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is not in order. Unless there is objection to the statement of fact made by the gentleman from Maine, citing from the record of the Official Reporter, the Chair will direct the correction to be made. The Chair understands there is no dispute on that point, and the correction will be made.

Mr. WHEELER. The Chair will surely consent to give me a few minutes to explain.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have here the manuscript as sent me from the Government Printing Office.

Mr. WHEELER. I have not objected to the gentleman's statement——

The SPEAKER. Very well; the correction will be made.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. If anybody is to discuss this matter, I want to do so. If I am not permitted to discuss it, I object to anybody else doing so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that as the correction has been made, there is nothing before the House for the gentleman from Alabama or the gentleman from Maine to discuss.

Mr. CRISP. Does it not occur to the House that the gentleman from Alabama should be allowed to make an explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman from Alabama desires to make a statement with regard to how this occurred——

Mr. WHEELER. That is all I want.

The SPEAKER. That, the Chair thinks, would be a question of privilege for him, but as to going into the question of fact, whether the gentleman from Maine was correct in his statements made yesterday, that would be reopening the whole debate. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Georgia must recognize this.

Mr. CRISP. I simply think that, in view of what has been said, the gentleman from Alabama ought to have the privilege of explaining why he made the change, if he did make it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that how or why a member changed a record of a matter on which he was in debate with another member, without his knowledge or consent, might be a subject of explanation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to suggest that up to this time there has been no accusation or reflection or intimation in regard to the gentleman from Alabama. I had no knowledge as to how the change was made in that manuscript. I have not even inquired. I simply say it is a fact. I know that the language embodied in this typewritten copy was the language used on yesterday. That is my own memory of it, and that is the recollection of a number of gentlemen around me who know what occurred at the time. Who made the alteration I do not pretend to know, but that an alteration was made will be attested by many of the members who were present on the floor on yesterday.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that I made the correction. In accordance with your honor's ruling, I will state that on yesterday when the gentleman from Maine made the statement that the Democrats on this side of the House were unanimously against the bill, my recollection was brought to the fact that in the very last day of the Forty-eighth Congress the gentleman from Maine himself rose in his place on the floor and said, as I will read from the RECORD:

I want to announce——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask if this is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama should be confined to the actual question pending, as to the change in the RECORD.

Mr. WHEELER. I will endeavor to do so, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Maine said:

I want to announce that the Senate unanimously passed the bill——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. There is no question here as to what the Senate did. It has nothing whatever to do with the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Alabama that his remarks, if they are to be in the nature of a personal privilege, must be confined to the subject actually before the House, namely, the alteration of the record of the proceedings of the House in a matter of debate without consent of the other party.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILES. Was it not ruled—I respectfully submit to the Chair with reference to the point of order made on the gentleman from Maine—that it was in order for him to make a statement preliminary to the question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. MILES. I submit that that is just what the gentleman from Alabama is now doing.

The SPEAKER. It does not seem so to the Chair, although it may be the fact.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not rise to a question of privilege, as I understand it, but simply to reply to reference to myself by the gentleman from Maine. The Chair will see what I am stating is entirely relevant.

Having in mind the statement of the gentleman from Maine that this question had been acted upon unanimously by the Senate, I made the reply I did with regard to his statement of the attitude of the Democrats on this side of the House on the question of General Grant's retirement. Immediately afterwards, having ascertained exactly the facts, I called upon the gentleman from Maine and asked him to allow me to explain the mistake, and to inform the House as to what the actual facts were, for neither the gentleman from Maine nor myself were entirely accurate in our statements, and I wanted to inform the House exactly what the facts were.

Now, the remarks of the gentleman from Maine would indicate that the Democrats of the House, as a body, were against the bill——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a question of order. I call the attention of the Chair to the decision on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia against myself. If an argument is to be permitted on the part of the gentleman from Alabama, I wish to say that I am loaded with arguments myself, and desire to be heard upon them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that the gentleman from Alabama should confine himself exclusively to the question of privilege, namely, to the actual fact whether or not the RECORD was changed without the consent of the other party.

Mr. WHEELER (continuing). After making three different attempts to be permitted to correct the matter in the House, I then did avail myself of that privilege which is accorded to every member when he finds he has made a mistake or an inaccuracy in a statement; I corrected the matter myself. I repeat, that I tried three times in the House to correct it and was not allowed to do so, and therefore corrected it and put it in the form that the gentleman has read to the House, and I did it with the knowledge that the stenographer's report was to be sent to the gentleman from Maine for revision, and therefore I knew he would see my correction, and, his attention being called to his error, it was my hope he would correct his erroneous statement also.

We all have a right, as I understand it, to make such corrections, and members of the House and Senate avail themselves of this right continually. The object of every member should be, of course, to correct such mistakes, to tell the truth in all such matters, and not misinform the House or the country.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that this is fair to me. If the gentleman is permitted to go into this kind of argument, I should have the same privilege——

The SPEAKER. The Chair, with permission of the gentleman, will regard the incident as closed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Because it hardly seems in accordance with the logic of the rule to check the flow of my eloquence—— [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Perhaps that would be easier than to check that of the gentleman from Alabama.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees under the rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. I desire to call up the appropriation for the naval establishment if the motion be adopted.

The motion of Mr. BOUTELLE was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to proceed with the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the naval service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, the bill which is now before the committee has no special novel features. It runs along the general line of naval legislation, and is devoted simply to carrying forward the work of maintaining and increasing our naval establishment. I do not think it is necessary to make any elaborate remarks in favor of the bill. In the early stages of our naval development, or the development of our new naval force, more or less explanation in detail seemed to be necessary; but since that time we have gone forward consecutively and successfully in the building up of our new Navy. The people generally are familiarized with the stages of that progress, so that it is hardly necessary to go over the ground in anything like detail. As, however, a large number of the members of the present House are members for the first time, it may be proper for me to cursorily run over the history of this rehabilitation of the service up to the present time.

The new Navy, so called, had its origin, if I may use that word, in an act passed in the Forty-seventh Congress, which prohibited the expenditure of money for the further repairs of our old wooden ships in every case where such repairs would involve an expenditure of more than 20 per cent of the cost of a new vessel of similar type. From the time of the war up to that point we had been incurring large expenditures, and the Government had been incurring more or less severe criticism for the large amount expended in repairing our old wooden ships. It required heroic determination to change this entire policy. The public had become so used to looking at the historic vessels that formed the Navy of that day as invincible, as retaining their pristine usefulness and power, that a proposition which looked to the extinction of our wooden Navy within a few years, by sending these ships to the auction shop and the junk shop, was a somewhat startling innovation. But that law was passed. We are reaping the benefits of it to-day. That was followed by the appointment of a special board to present designs for a certain number of ships of modern type, and an appropriation was made to begin the construction of four ships, the Chicago, the Boston, the Atlanta, and the Dolphin, which were in due time completed and are now a part of the new steel Navy. Following that, on the day of the adjournment of the Forty-eighth Congress, an act was passed making an appropriation for the construction of several vessels that had been provided for, but for which no appropriation had been made.

Under the law the Baltimore, the Philadelphia, and one or two others of our steel cruisers were put under construction under the administration of Secretary Whitney, who entered into the work with great zeal and energy. From that time until the present the work has gone forward, the attention of the Department and of the Government during the early years being devoted exclusively to the construction of protected cruisers, finally to the construction of the armored ship Monterey for coast defense, and the Maine and the Texas, which are now rated as second-class battle ships.

In the Fifty-first Congress it was first proposed to enter upon the construction of the heaviest class of fighting ships, which are designated in naval nomenclature as battle ships. During that Congress three vessels of that class, of about 10,120 tons, were placed under construction. At the same time authority was given for the construction of an especially fast cruiser, which proved to be the Columbia, followed at the next session by a similar vessel, now in commission, under the name of the Minneapolis. Since that time there have been authorized three more battle ships, the Iowa, in the Fifty-second Congress, which is to be launched this week at Philadelphia, and the Kentucky and Kearsarge, which were contracted for on the 2d day of January and are to be constructed at Newport News.

This is a very brief and concise statement of a work that has been going on for a little more than a dozen years, but which really represents the most remarkable development of the resources and capacity of the American people in any line of progress observable during my public life.

When the first appropriation was made for the construction of steel ships, it was an absolute impossibility to provide the material in this country for the construction even of a steel gunboat of the size of the Dolphin. We were dependent upon foreign forges for the armor for the protective decks; we were dependent upon foreign workshops for a large portion of the steel plating that entered into their construction. We were absolutely unable in any part of the United States, throughout its whole breadth and broad expanse, to produce the hollow compressed shafting required for any one of these ships.

To-day we are standing in a position where for years one of the fundamental provisions of our appropriation bills has been that every part and parcel of a ship shall be of material of domestic manufacture. Instead of being obliged to send abroad for every forging that entered into our armor plate and into the manufacture of our guns for the Navy, we determined to emancipate ourselves from foreign dependence in that regard; and years ago, I think in 1886, by the joint action of the House and Senate, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War were authorized to issue proposals for $10,000,000 worth of steel forgings for armor and guns to be produced in an American establishment that should give a guaranty of its ability to begin the manufacture of these forgings within a certain period. I remember very well when that proposition first came before Congress. I recollect as if it were yesterday when the bill was reported here, in its reading, when the Clerk had reached the point where the Secretary of the Navy was required to build these vessels and to obtain this armor of domestic manufacture if it could be obtained at a reasonable price or in a reasonable time, I made the motion to strike out the qualification and compel the use of American material without limitation. The argument was made, on a strong basis, that we could not produce this material, and that was the fact at the time.

Gentlemen took a different view as to how long it would be before we could possibly supply the materials required. I took the ground that we had better wait for years, if necessary, in order to stimulate the production of these materials on our own soil than go on building ships for the construction of which we should be continually dependent upon foreign countries for the materials; and I emphasized my position, I remember, in making the statement that, so far as my own view was concerned, if at the end of ten years we could have 20 first-class ships of war of modern type afloat under the American flag, a large or considerable portion of the materials of which were necessarily procured abroad, or at the end of ten years should not have a single modern naval ship that would have been constructed in our own jurisdiction, and on our own soil have one great manufacturing plant that would be capable of producing every material that should enter into the construction of our war ships, I would take the latter alternative.

The alternative was taken to the extent to which I have referred. These proposals were sent out; and the Bethlehem Iron Company, of Pennsylvania, immediately entered upon the erection of what is to-day the most powerful, the most extensive, and the most successful steel-forging plant in the world. Instead of being, as we were ten years ago, in absolute dependence upon foreign countries for all important materials, we have to-day at Bethlehem a plant which contains the most powerful machinery on the globe. While the great works of Krupp have a hammer which strikes with an impact of 95 tons, the great hammer at Bethlehem comes down with a thud, carrying 125 tons to the blow; and instead of our being compelled either to go abroad or to take inferior material, we have the most improved facilities; and I ought to make this remark, that besides the Bethlehem Company the great plant of the Carnegies and the great plants at Midvale and elsewhere in the country have contributed to this march of progress. So that to-day we are not only not dependent upon one, but we are not dependent upon any one establishment in our own country. We are emancipated, so far as naval construction is concerned, from dependence upon any other nation on the globe; and when we consider, Mr. Chairman, that in the construction of a ship, and especially of a ship of war, there is concentrated more of the labor, the ingenuity, and the skill of the various avocations of our people than in any other construction, we can readily see the stride of progress we have made.

We have made progress in another direction. At the time the first bill for the construction of steel ships came up in the committee it contained a provision for purchasing the engines abroad. The provision was based upon the belief that we could not construct the high-power machinery required for forcing modern war vessels at the speed that had been attained in modern times. The matter was discussed animatedly in the committee. I remember distinctly the positiveness with which the opinion—it was more than an opinion—with which the judgment was expressed by certain gentlemen that we could not build the great machinery required to drive one of these war ships at the requisite speed in this country, and that it would be years and years before we would attain the ability to do so. We struck foreign engines out of the bill; we struck them out in the committee. Finally we received suggestions from the Secretary of the Navy to that effect, and he expressed his view that we could trust to the skill, ingenuity, and progressive efforts of American artisans to supply us with the machinery we needed, although we have been for so long a time out of the business of building ships of war.

The wisdom of that action was demonstrated almost immediately. Within a few months after this prediction was made that we could not build these great engines, the Baltimore was under construction by the Cramps, and produced a higher degree of horsepower than the English plans required. While she was under construction the builders came to Washington and suggested a modification of the machinery for her sister ship, the Philadelphia, which was adopted by the Department, and this American shipbuilding firm built the engines for that great ship, and we have gone on improving until in the Columbia and the Minneapolis we have set the pace for ocean cruisers for the world. Having been a witness of this evolution within these few years, it is almost startling to my mind to contemplate the contrast between that hour, when so many earnest, able men, some of them engaged in business that was akin to that of engine building, declared that it must be years before we could develop the tools of precision that would enable us to construct a great, powerful, successful marine engine, and the time, only a few years later, when the Columbia was making the ocean record of the world for speed.

Mr. Chairman, that, in brief, is the history of this wonderful evolution of the American Navy, and we have now reached the point where, while our Navy is small in number of ships as compared with the navies of the great powers of the world, we believe, and we believe intelligently and with reason, that we have a navy to-day that, ship for ship, is the best navy in the world. [Applause.] It ought to be a proud thought for every American citizen that we have bearing our flag the fastest cruiser that sails the ocean [applause]; that the Columbia is really the "gem of the ocean," rightly named and worthy of her proud title. [Applause.] We ought to be, and we are, all of us, proud that in the great cruiser New York we have the finest protected steel cruiser under the canopy of heaven, admitted to be so by the experts of all the nations of the globe. We ought to feel proud that within a year the Emperor of Germany, himself at the head of a nation having one of the most powerful navies afloat, paid the unqualified compliment to this superb American cruiser, the New York, of saying that she exceeded all of his expectations and all of his ideas as to the possible perfection of a great ship of war. It ought to be and it is a matter of pride that to-day in the Indiana, which is now in commission, in the Massachusetts and the Oregon, about to go into commission, we have ships of war that are conceded to be, ship for ship, the most powerful battle ships in the world. And this is not mere home congratulation. It is the testimony of the most skilled experts of the navies of Europe and of the Orient.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have reached the point where we have a fair number of cruisers, and they are of the best. We have a fair number of gunboats, and they are of the best. We have five double-turreted monitors and a double-turreted coast-defense ship, the Monterey. For harbor defense we have the Maine and the Texas, which are second-rate battle ships, for our second line, and we are about to place in commission, or at least we shall have during the present year, three of our first-class battle ships carrying the flag and fully manned. In addition thereto we have one other battle ship, the Iowa, which, though of the same type, is believed to be superior in some respects to those already completed, and at Newport News we are about to enter upon the construction of the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, which are somewhat larger and are believed to have still other improvements in construction and efficiency. That makes six battle ships which have been provided for and are now either completed, in process of completion, or under contract. We have only three torpedo boats, but we have a number under construction at the Herreshoff and other works, and it is believed by the Department, in which belief the Committee on Naval Affairs have cordially coincided, that the policy of our Government at this time should be to make whatever addition it is deemed wise to provide for at the present session by increasing the strength of our line of battle.

The utility of our cruisers of all classes is perfectly obvious to anyone who considers the needs of a navy, but to all who have given thought to the real final use of a naval force to the United States it is clear that our main reliance must be placed upon our line of battle, and it is the belief of naval officers of experience and of other experts generally that the real coast defenses of the United States must depend in a large degree—I believe in the largest degree—upon our first line of battle, which must be outside of our headlands, on the water. Any nation that proposes to successfully defend its coast line must first prevent the possible landing of an enemy on its shores; and against any force that could assail us from across the ocean the most powerful defense, the wisest and the most effective defense of which I can conceive, would be a cordon of battle ships along our coast line that should prevent an enemy's fleet from entering our harbors or making a landing upon our coast. We confidently believe that a sufficient fleet of vessels of the type of those now completed and under construction, if judiciously placed outside of our coast line, would enable us to defend this country in all probability against any naval force that could be sent across the sea; and if we can do that the problem of coast defense is solved. If we can not actually accomplish that, we can certainly inflict such damage and cause such delay and interpose such obstacles to an assault upon our coast as would make the water line of battle the most important consideration of our defense.

There is another phase in which this appeals to our desire for security. However strongly we may fortify the headlands of our coasts (and I for one am earnestly in favor of strong and powerful coast defenses), the forts along our coast line must, of course, occupy fixed positions; and an enemy, whenever possible, will seek to avoid the fortified points and effect his landing where those defenses do not exist. In case of an emergency we can not move those forts so as to reenforce each other; but with a sufficient fleet of heavy battle ships the click of the telegraph could assemble at any threatened point a half dozen or a dozen or twenty (if we should go so far) of the most powerful forts that have been erected anywhere, and that could be moved into the most advantageous position, not only from day to day, but from hour to hour and from moment to moment during a conflict. So that I think there can be no question of the overpowering utility of a battle line of naval ships for our coast defense. It was with this view that, in drafting the provision authorizing the first three battle ships, I suggested, and the committee adopted, the phraseology of "seagoing coast-line battle ships," so as to characterize this class of vessels and to dedicate these ships as the patrols and defenders of the coast of the United States.

In the present bill, Mr. Chairman, we have followed the lines of the estimates very closely, making comparatively few modifications. The modifications that we have made will be found in general stated in the brief report which has been submitted here. One of the important features of the bill is the provision for the enlistment from time to time during the coming year of a thousand additional men and boys. This provision has been inserted in accordance with the request of the Secretary of the Navy and was based upon his statement of the fact that vessels to be put in commission during the coming year will require this additional force of men to make their crews. A year ago the Secretary requested Congress to grant him 2,000 additional men; Congress granted him 1,000. This year the request for an additional thousand was renewed, and the committee have recommended authority for their enlistment. This will account for the increase we have made in the appropriation under the head of "Pay for the Navy."

Under the heading "Bureau of Navigation" there has been a small increase rendered necessary in order to provide for the outfits and bounties of apprentices for waterworks at the training station in Rhode Island (this item having been cut down last year), and $2,000 for necessary repairs to the Naval War College, earnestly requested by the Department.

Under the Bureau of Ordnance we have made a larger increase, although it is proper to state that the items in this bill which are an increase over the last appropriations were contained, I think, almost entirely in the bill reported to and passed by this House last year, although, for some reason of which we have not been advised, those items were stricken out in the Senate. One of these is a provision for a reserve supply of guns. We have no reserve guns. We have no supply upon which to draw in case of emergency or in case of the disabling of a portion of the guns. Your committee deemed it unwise to permit this condition of things to continue, and therefore reported in favor of an appropriation of $250,000 to manufacture this reserve supply.

In the reserve for the Navy there are no projectiles that would be at all adequate to a demand that might arise at any time. We appropriate $200,000 for a reserve supply of projectiles. We also provide $142,000 for an additional supply of torpedoes, which we regard as especially desirable, not only in view of the torpedo boats already under construction, but in view of the fact that we have provided for 15 more.

We also provide for reserve guns for the auxiliary cruisers of the Navy; and in that connection I may properly call attention to the fact that this naval development of ours has already borne the fruits that we anticipated in stimulating a return of the American flag to the ocean as a representative of American commerce.

In closing the report of the committee in 1890 a brief reference was made to the stimulus that this building up of great naval plants would cause in behalf of our commercial marine, and the statement of the committee closed in this way:

The result of this effort to build up the Navy would be to increase the power, protect the honor, and promote the prosperity of our great nation by setting afloat a navy that will not only be an outer bulwark of defense in case of war, but that, we trust, may prove in peace the messenger of good will to other lands and show to us and to the world again that commerce follows the flag.

I think I am justified in saying that, as a direct result of the development of our resources for the building of modern steel ships, we have returned our flag to the ocean, and it now floats over a great international line of steamships which is called the American Line. It has brought under our flag two ships which, when they were permitted to American registry, were regarded as the finest steamships in the world, the New York and the Paris, and it stimulated the construction at the same shipyard that gave some of the finest of our vessels—the great war ships—the construction of two great American ocean steamers that are American from stem to stern, from rail to keelson, the St. Louis and the St. Paul, steamers that are a source of pride to every American citizen, and that are to-day closely wrestling with the speed record of steamers on the Atlantic Ocean. So, Mr. Chairman, commerce has already followed the flag, and is following it, and we have intimations and evidences from every direction that the example thus set, the way thus pointed out, is to be followed in the future until we shall find again the American flag, representing our American commerce, in every port of the civilized world. We ought not to minimize or underrate the effect that a great Navy—great, I mean, in power and excellence—exercises as a representative of our country, always has exercised and always will exercise, in supplementing our commerce with the other nations of the world.

We have made some appropriations of a minor character for naval magazines where they were regarded as urgently necessary, and also for repairs for the retaining sea wall at the torpedo station at Newport. We have also increased the appropriation for the Bureau of Equipment, to apply to the increase in our vessels afloat.

Under the head of Yards and Docks we have also made an increase for the maintenance of the plants at those institutions; and under Public Works we have made an increase of $126,580.78, the appropriation being principally applied to carry on the work and improvements at Brooklyn, League Island, Mare Island, and Washington Navy-Yards, the Puget Sound and Port Royal naval stations, and at the Naval Academy.

There is a slight increase in the appropriation for the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery by reason of the additional number of men to be cared for.

Under the Bureau of Construction and Repair there is an increase of $1,065,500. In the item of construction and repair of vessels there is an increase of $350,000 over the appropriation of last year and it is urgently required for continuing the work during the present fiscal year, and a similar amount is appropriated to cover a deficiency, which is made immediately available. This is to be applied on ships on which the work had to be suspended on account of the inadequacy of the appropriation last year. We have therefore taken the appropriation of last year and added to it the deficiency required this year, and appropriated $1,250,000 to carry on the work during the ensuing year, which is not an extravagant sum in view of the large increase of work in the Navy. We also appropriate $250,000 for carrying on the work of repairs to the Chicago, and $100,000 for the Hartford.

Under the Bureau of Steam Engineering there is an increase of $246,500. We appropriate $235,000 for new boilers and machinery for the Atlanta, the Dolphin, and the Hartford.

For the Naval Academy there is an increase of $40,883, $15,000 of which is for grading the grounds, $15,000 for the new main sewer, which is required, and $5,000 for dredging.

We have increased by $136,223 the appropriation for the Marine Corps, largely to provide for the 500 additional men reported to us by the commandant and the Secretary as necessary, in view of the increase of the number of our ships afloat.

Under the head of increase of the Navy the estimates called for $9,522,883 for carrying on the work of construction of the hulls and machinery, the armor and armament of vessels heretofore authorized. It will be seen that this is an item, therefore, that covers solely the work on new vessels of the Navy. After full consideration it was finally determined that the authorization this year should be on the line of battle ships and torpedo boats. We have recommended the construction of four additional battle ships of a similar type to those already under construction. The tonnage of these vessels has been always approximately stated in the bills authorizing them and has not necessarily limited the size in detail, the size and character of the vessel being limited solely by the authorization or limit of cost. Hitherto we have authorized battle ships to be built at a cost, exclusive of armament, not to exceed $4,000,000. None of the ships that have been constructed or contracted for at this time have reached so high a price as that. That is to say, they have never reached the limit of cost fixed in the bill; and we have thought it wise, therefore, to decrease the limit by $250,000, recommending that the total cost shall not exceed $3,750,000; and I stop here to explain that this was simply to remove from the bill a limitation that experience has shown to be entirely too large, and does not in any way indicate that the vessels to be constructed are to be in any sense not as efficient as (and we expect that they will be superior to) those heretofore ordered, which have never cost, exclusive of armament, so much, or nearly so much, as $4,000,000. The largest authorization that has ever been made for ships before this session, I think, was in the Fifty-first Congress, when we authorized three battle ships, the cruiser Columbia, and some minor vessels. This bill therefore makes the largest authorization of vessels that ever has been made.

There were some considerations at the outset that would have inclined the committee to a more moderate recommendation. The condition of our finances, to which attention had been called two years ago and the present year by the Secretary of the Navy, was one of the considerations. The Secretary of the Navy reported in favor of building 2 battle ships and 12 torpedo boats; but after looking the whole matter carefully over, considering the state of public opinion so far as we could judge it, and using our best efforts to make to this House what we believed to be a judicious recommendation, the committee concluded to give the benefit of the doubt on the side of liberality, even when the financial situation is not quite what we wish it were, and we ask your favorable consideration and action upon our recommendation that we authorize at this session 4 additional battle ships and 15 torpedo boats. When they are put under construction that will make, in addition to the 2 that were contracted for on the 2d of January, 6 battle ships, the construction of which will be inaugurated during the present year; by far the most noteworthy addition to our Navy in its history, and, as we believe, as large an authorization as all the circumstances would fairly warrant. We hope that the House will not consider it too large, because we have arrived at this conclusion after going over the whole subject with great care, and we submit it to Congress with confidence that it will ratify the judgment of the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, before the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs concludes, will he state the estimated cost of the 4 new battle ships and 15 torpedo vessels that are authorized, including armament?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was going to state that. Following my citation of the fact that the estimates called for $9,522,883 of appropriations in this bill for the carrying on of work on vessels already under construction, I was going to state that that amount has been decreasing somewhat because of the completion of contracts upon vessels. Now, in addition to that we propose in this bill to make appropriations, for these 4 battle ships and the 15 torpedo boats, of all the money that the Department estimates can be properly profitably expended during the coming fiscal year. I ought perhaps to say that in the bill passed last year which authorized two battle ships, the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, there was substantially no appropriation made for their construction. I think there was added under the head of appropriations perhaps $100,000 or so for making their designs, but there was no appropriation made to carry forward their construction, and their contracts were not entered into until the 2d day of January of this year. There is incorporated in this $9,522,883 of estimates the amount deemed requisite for commencing and carrying on the construction of those two battle ships during the coming year.

Now we have put in, in addition to that, $500,000 for each of the battle ships, making $2,000,000, and $1,256,250 for the 15 torpedo boats. Those appropriations are based upon estimates submitted to us by the Secretary of the Navy, that $500,000 will be required for work on each of the 4 battle ships, and that these torpedo boats, which are to cost, the 5 large ones $870,000, and the 10 smaller ones $800,000—it was the opinion of the Secretary that 75 per cent of the total amount would be required during this year. Seventy-five per cent of these amounts makes $3,256,250, which, added to the $2,000,000 for the battle ships, makes $3,256,250 that we add to the estimates, making the total appropriations in this bill for the increase of the Navy $12,779,133.

In reply to the question of my colleague from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], I will state that the battle ships now under construction at Newport News were contracted for, for their hulls and machinery, exclusive of armament, for $2,225,000, I think. That is the approximate amount. In addition to that, the hulls require, as estimated, $647,000 of hull armor, and, in addition to that, the armament will cost something over $2,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. For each battle ship?

Mr. BOUTELLE. For each battle ship. I will give the estimate of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance. On the two battle ships now under construction at Newport News the bids received and accepted for the hulls and machinery were $2,255,000. The cost of the hull armor will be $637,000, making $2,892,000 that will be paid out of the limitation made by Congress of $4,000,000. Then, under the head of armor and armament, the armor and gun protection will cost $2,405,000, making the total cost of those two battle ships each $5,297,000; and I may say here that those vessels were contracted for at a considerably lower rate than the previous ships. The first battle ships were contracted for, exclusive of armament, for $3,120,000, and these bids, as will be seen, are considerably below those. I ought to say, in that connection, what I should have said when I was speaking of the development of these shipbuilding plants, that their development has caused the most marvelous reduction in the cost of the material for these vessels. The cost of the production of steel has decreased to a degree that would be hardly credible; in some instances nearly 50 per cent. So much so that it has been stated approximately that three battle ships could be built now for very little more than two would have cost ten years ago.

The torpedo boats, as I have said, five of them, are to cost $875,000 each. We have not specified that they should cost so much, but we desire, at the request of the Department, to leave a discretion there, to make some of them larger and more expensive than others, if deemed desirable. So we have simply provided the aggregate amount. They are to have a speed of not less than 26 knots, and it is hoped that they will reach a much higher rate; and in fact we have every confidence that they will. The 10 small torpedo boats have also been provided for in an appropriation in bulk, in order that the Department may so arrange their designs as to meet such contingencies as the Department think are important to consider in regard to their transportation and utilization at various points on our coast and inland as the occasion may arise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I desire to say anything further. It is a fruitful theme, but I have already occupied considerably more time that I intended.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman of the committee will pardon me, before he closes I want to see if I understand correctly what the ultimate cost of the authorization of new vessels provided for in this bill would be. I understand $21,168,000 will be the ultimate cost of four battle ships, if I took the figures correctly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You have made the figures?

Mr. DINGLEY. Two million eight hundred and two thousand dollars for the hull and equipment and $2,405,000 for the armament, making the cost of each battle ship $5,207,000, if I took down the figures correctly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is the estimate furnished by the Ordnance Department, by Commodore Sampson, of the cost of the two ships under construction at Newport News.

Mr. DINGLEY. And the cost of four, with armament, is $21,168,000. Then the 15 torpedo boats will cost how much?

Mr. BOUTELLE. They are to cost $800,000 and $875,000, which is $1,675,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. That makes about $23,000,000 for increases in the Navy by new vessels authorized in this bill?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Assuming that the cost will be identical.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, assuming that the cost is identical.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Ultimately they will not cost so much.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the battle ships—the chairman of the committee will pardon me—having been contracted for recently, when the market price of steel is probably at the lowest point that will be reached for many years, I think it is but fair to conclude that the new battle ships will cost at least as much, as it is to be borne in mind that steel has been abnormally low.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will state to the gentleman that so far as the committee are concerned, we have had no information brought to us that would indicate an increase in the cost; have we, Mr. CUMMINGS?

Mr. CUMMINGS. None at all; but the cost will be less.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think that is a fair estimate.

Mr. BOUTELLE. In my report I state the cost of the 4 battle ships and the 15 torpedo boats, exclusive of armament, at $16,675,000. I did not make the figures as to the total cost. They are to aggregate about 45,600 tons displacement—that is, the vessels carried in this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. They are to be about the same size?

Mr. BOUTELLE. They are to be about the same size—about 11,000 tons. The Iowa, I think, is a little over 11,000 tons.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Eleven thousand two hundred and fifty tons.

Mr. DINGLEY. That will be $16,675,000 for the new vessels authorized, exclusive of armament. I understood the chairman of the committee to state that the cost of the armanent is $2,405,000, estimated, for each battle ship. That will be $9,600,000 to be added to $16,675,000, and that will carry it up to over $25,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I did not understand the chairman to state the amount.

Mr. DINGLEY. He made an estimate of the amount required for the armament.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What do you name the amount?

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that the estimated cost of the 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats, exclusive of armament, is stated in the report at $16,675,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is that erroneous?

Mr. DINGLEY. That is the statement in the report; and that the cost of the armament, exclusive of that sum, about $2,405,000 for each battle ship, which would be $9,600,000 for the 4 battle ships, and that added together carries the whole amount up to $26,275,000. That is the authorization in the bill for the 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats, with armament. And that is in addition, of course, to the completion of the vessels already authorized, 2 battle ships having been authorized last year and the first appropriation made in this appropriation bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is what I endeavored to state. I will state it consecutively, so that it will appear in the RECORD. The 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats will aggregate about 45,600 tons, to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding sixteen millions—no, my colleague's figures are not correct, because the estimate made here is up to the full limit of cost, which these vessels will not in all probability reach. My statement in my report was about the authorization. Of course in a report to this House we could not state just exactly what the ships were to cost before they were contracted for, and I stated that they were to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding a certain amount, but I did not say they would cost that amount. They are authorized to cost $16,000,000. The proper way to figure for the purposes of construction here would be to multiply the total cost of each of these ships at Newport News by four.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am amazed, Mr. Chairman, that I have trespassed so long upon the committee. I had no intention of doing so.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will yield the chairman of the committee whatever additional time he desires.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thank my colleague.

Mr. HANLY. Will my colleague, the gentleman from Maine, permit me to make a suggestion as to these figures?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly.

Mr. HANLY. The total authorization was $22,863,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Including armament?

Mr. HANLY. Including armament. That is based on the cost of the two ships recently contracted for.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the estimate of the authorization of new vessels on page 2 of the report, of $16,675,000, is not based on the cost of the battle ships recently contracted for?

Mr. HANLY. I am giving the torpedo boats. The difference arises in this way: We have appropriated or fixed the limit of the appropriation for the hull of each vessel at $3,750,000, whereas they are actually let at less than $2,000,000, and the difference between the figures comes in there.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Three million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars each is the limit that these vessels may be permitted to reach, but they were bid for at $2,255,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. How much would that reduce them?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The 4 battle ships, if contracted for at the same rates as those now being built at Newport News, will cost, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY] has stated, $21,188,000. We have authorized an expenditure, and expect to meet it, on the torpedo boats of $1,656,250, which would make the total cost of these new vessels added to this bill $22,844,250.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire whether either of my colleagues on the committee desires to speak at this time, or whether they would prefer to go on with the bill, reserving the right to speak at such point as may seem to them best?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to submit a few remarks at this point. We shall have no trouble, I think, about the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Naval Affairs has done its work very carefully and thoroughly. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] has correctly analyzed this bill. In my opinion it is as economical a bill as was ever brought into the House from the Committee on Naval Affairs for the inspection of Congress. It is even less in amount than the bill brought into the House last year. In the last session the House passed a bill carrying $31,636,823. That was $75,000 more than the bill which is brought before you to-day. In view of the war cloud on the horizon, I will say it seems to me that this is an exceedingly economical bill, and that it ought to meet with no opposition on the floor of this House. We certainly ought to keep pace by ratio in the increase in our Navy with the increase in the English navy, and above all at this time. I was in favor of 6 battle ships while the bill was under consideration in committee, for I believe that the best defense in the world is the means of offense. But voted down in committee, I accept the report of the chairman. I find this statement regarding the increase of the English navy, to which I call attention. It is a statement made in the British Parliament:

Mr. Goschen said that the Admiralty proposed to increase the navy by 4,900 seamen and 500 extra marines.

We have provided for an increase of only 1,000 seamen and 500 marines.

For guns and ammunition the Admiralty proposed a supplemental estimate of £200,000, and for the ensuing financial year they proposed an increase of £850,000.

That is six times as much as the increase proposed in this bill.

The Admiralty also proposed an increase of £2,250,000 for docks, and explained that the proposed dock works would increase the amount, £8,900,000 provided by the last estimates, to £14,000,000.

This is a hundred times as much as we have appropriated for the same purpose.

Mr. Goschen then said that between 1889 and 1896 105 ships and 62 torpedo destroyers had been built or were building. He admitted that this was a formidable list; but the Admiralty proposed to spend an additional £1,000,000, including the £200,000 previously proposed, as a supplementary estimate for guns and ammunition during the present year. The Admiralty had judged it advisable to undertake the construction of 5 additional battle ships, 4 first-class cruisers, 3 second-class cruisers, and 28 torpedo destroyers, in addition to minor expenses, such as anchoring a training ship at Queenstown and replacing the cadet ship Britannia by a college for naval cadets.

Besides the vessels mentioned, Mr. Goschen also said the admiralty proposed to provide for 6 third-class cruisers, and all would be commenced in 1896.

Now, gentlemen, that is five times the amount proposed for the increase of the Navy under this bill. And I hold, sir, that it is a duty which we owe the country to maintain at least our ratio with the war ships of England as it stands to-day. I do not believe that we ought to allow the English navy to again become as powerful in comparison with the American Navy as it was at the close of the war. Let us, sir, at least keep what we have gained, if we gain no more.

Mr. Chairman, I regretted that no more seamen were provided for in this bill. I understood the Secretary to say that he would like to have 1,500, and discretion on the part of the President to increase the number to 3,000 in a warlike emergency. I have acquiesced in the report of my friend the chairman of the committee. I was also sorry that no appropriation was made for the dock at Algiers, La., but after learning that there was a dispute with regard to what kind of a dock should be built, and believing from what the chairman said that he would be in favor of such a dock when this dispute shall be settled, I was glad to let the question go over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Perhaps the statement just made by the gentleman might be misleading without this explanation on my part. I stated that I was unwilling to make an appropriation for constructing at that point a dry dock of a character that might prove unsatisfactory; and while I have always been warmly in favor of having a naval station on the Gulf somewhere, when the location should be properly determined, my view has been for a number of years, and still is, that without regard to sections or geographical considerations we should first supply all our navy-yards where there are extensive plants for carrying on construction and repairing with dry docks before we should commence the construction of a simple dock at any point where there is now no naval station.

Mr. CUMMINGS. In other words, it was a question of capacious docks without regard to site.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further remarks to make upon the bill, and if no gentleman on this side of the House desires to speak——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the gentleman from New York concludes, I should like to ask him a question. I see that these battle ships provided for in this bill are all to draw over 25 feet of water.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, as I understand, it is impossible for ships of that draft to go into any port south of Newport News to coal.

Mr. BOUTELLE. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think the design of these vessels was modified for the express purpose of reducing their draft.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to have some information on that point.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I find by referring to the documents that the Secretary caused the designs for these two ships to be reexamined and modified with the express view of reducing their draft, so that they have been given more beam, as architects would say. They have been made broader and given more floor for the purpose of making them draw less, and they are now estimated to have a draft of 23 feet 6 inches.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will those ships with that draft be able to enter any ports south of Newport News to coal?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not know that I can speak positively and fully on that point at this moment. They will be able to go into the Mississippi River without any trouble. They will be able to go into Port Royal and may be docked there. I remember that at Port Royal when high tide was on, the Indiana, which drew, I think, 24 feet of water, could not be docked. I am not familiar at this moment with the depth of water at the other Southern ports. Some gentleman from Georgia can tell us with regard to Savannah. I do not feel sure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then that would give us two battle ships which would be able to coal in ports south of Newport News.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Of course four of the ships are not yet designed; but my expectation is that they will be designed with the same view of having them of as light a draft as possible. I presume they will not draw any more than these other two. I think that a vessel of 23 feet 6 inches draft could go into Mobile and Pensacola.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Not into the harbor of Mobile, but the bay.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I mean the lower bay.

Mr. LOW. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CUMMINGS. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. LOW. About twenty-five minutes, or perhaps a half hour.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield thirty minutes of the time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOW. Mr. Chairman, there is an old military saying that in time of peace the sentinel is apt to sleep on his post. This bill, which is before us for consideration, I have heard read to-day for the first time, but be that as it may, any bill which provides for an increase in our Navy touches one of the most popular sentiments in the heart of the American people—popular because it means the strengthening of an arm of our service; popular because it means better protection not only to our own seacoast, but for the American interests throughout the world.

The people of these United States do not want war; we do not invite hostilities; neither do we wish to extend our border lines; but, Mr. Chairman, the people of this country are tired of taking up the newspapers and reading now and again that some American citizen sojourning in a foreign land has been unjustly thrown into prison, and they are tired of having foreign nations minimizing our rights. Recent events have convinced those who have followed the trend of national affairs that the want of a Navy has been one of the reasons why we have had to suffer humiliation at the hands of foreign nations.

Build up our Navy, enact this bill, for it provides a step toward the construction of a national floating bulwark which, when completed, will speak louder, deeper, and more effectively than words in settling—aye, in preventing—international complications; then when the United States speaks, foreign ears which have been so deaf will suddenly come out of the infirmary with their hearing fully restored. Taking into consideration our thousands of miles of seacoast, our vast merchant marine, and world-wide commercial interests, we must admit that our policy has been suicidal in neglecting to keep our Navy up to a proper standard. Questions, if not disputes, have recently come to the surface, and the American people have realized—have been compelled to realize for the first time in thirty years—that the American Navy, which has ever been the pride and boast of the American heart, is numerically weak. Why is it so? Why are the great commercial interests of a maritime nation like ours left to the protection of a feeble Navy? The fact is our people since the close of the war have been so busy developing the country's resources that they forgot our ships of war. If we fail to provide for the outer lines of our defense we tempt foreign nations to interfere in our domestic affairs. Why, were a powerful nation to make war upon us to-morrow, the people of the United States would give up every railroad that runs from here to the Pacific, if they could, in exchange for a fleet of battle ships.

Our country must build up the Navy, keep it at a proper standard, and then there will be no occasion for thrilling the heart of our nation by a dynamite message. It is true that we are confronted with a depleted Treasury. But what has that to do with it? If the Administration is bankrupt, the country is not. There are loyal hearts and plenty of money among the 70,000,000 people living under the folds of our flag who will gladly and cheerfully indorse any outlay to build up the marine arm of our country's service and make it what it ought to be. I hope every Administration from now on will consider it a national duty, to wit, that the Army and Navy shall be the last two departments to economize upon. We want peace, but peace without honor means servitude. Peace with honor is expensive, but war is more so.

I hope, therefore, in discussing this bill that there will be no attempt to economize even in the smallest degree, for have we, Mr. Chairman, a more important function to perform than to provide for the national defense? We can not maintain and keep our position among the family of nations by talk. Boasting will not settle any dispute. Why, we might as well line ourselves up and down upon our shores and make faces at the foreign nations when international questions come up.

Have we forgotten the sentiment of this House on the Monroe doctrine when the Venezuelan question was before us? Have we forgotten the attitude of this body when the Cuban resolutions were introduced? Why, Mr. Chairman, a failure at the present time to strengthen our Navy in a superlative degree would be tantamount to making an apology to the world for our actions during the past two months.

Gentlemen can view our Navy from every point of the compass; they can diagnose the marine arm of the service with all the skill and all the experience of a lifetime; they may bias that skill and experience with theories or expediencies, but the fact will still remain that our Navy is numerically weak and that it needs something more than a homeopathic dose to strengthen it. The high attenuationists who wish to prescribe for this patient must give way for heroic treatment. If we fail at the present time to make provision for our Navy and to bring it up to a standard commensurate with our great wants, after the sheet lightning of warning has flashed into the eyes of this Republic, we shall commit an unpardonable national crime which neither this nor future generations will condone.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, unless some other gentleman desires to address the committee, I will ask unanimous consent that we may proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs, with the understanding that when that portion of the bill which provides for the increase of the Navy shall be reached my colleague of the committee [Mr. HANLY] shall be entitled to occupy the floor for twenty minutes or half an hour, as he may elect.

Mr. HANLY. Half an hour.

Mr. CUMMINGS. There are other gentlemen here who desire to speak——

Mr. HULICK. At that time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then I will ask unanimous consent that we go on with the reading of the bill——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Until we reach that item.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Until some gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. HULICK. We do not wish any limit.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I should like to make an inquiry. I do not care for one to say anything in regard to this bill generally, but when you reach the question of the increase of the Navy, I desire permission to offer a few feeble remarks for the good of the country and myself, and I can not do it in five minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman misunderstood me. I will make this proposition: I ask unanimous consent that we now proceed—unless some gentleman desires to take the floor at this time—to consider the bill under the five-minute rule by paragraphs, until we reach such point——

Mr. CUMMINGS. The increase of the Navy?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Unless some gentleman desires to speak before that, until we reach the paragraph for the increase of the Navy, when we will arrange how much time shall be occupied in general debate.

Mr. HULICK. With the understanding that if there should be any amendment proposed in regard to dry docks or any other important measure the same understanding would apply to that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, it would be under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULICK. I object to that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

Mr. HULICK. I wish it understood that the item of dry docks is to come under the same understanding as the item with reference to the increase of the Navy. As I understand the gentleman, he has only made his suggestion with reference to that one item of the increase of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the committee now proceed with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule until the portion of the bill which relates to increase of the Navy is reached. Is there objection?

Mr. HULICK. I object unless this modification is made——

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the gentleman's objection?

Mr. HULICK. That it shall apply not only to the increase of the Navy, but to the question of dry docks.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will state to the gentleman that there is no item for dry docks in the bill.

Mr. HULICK. That is very true; but an amendment might be offered. I understand the gentleman's proposition to apply simply to the item for the increase of the Navy, and I wish it to apply to an amendment for the increase of dry docks.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed with the bill under the five-minute rule until we reach some point where some gentleman desires more than five minutes, when time can be granted by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked for the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to say that it is nobody's purpose to cut off proper discussion.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Chairman, I should like merely to state——

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. The Chair is stating the proposition. Unanimous consent is asked that the committee now proceed with the bill under what is known as the five-minute rule until some portion of the bill is reached where any member of the committee desires to occupy more time than is allowed under the rules of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MEYER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether in the event that an amendment were proposed under the head of increase of the Navy—assuming that the bill pursues its regular course until that point is reached—whether if an amendment were offered in regard to dry docks, the chairman would claim that it was out of order and not pertinent to the bill, we having passed over the intervening portion of the bill?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I have reserved all points of order. We can not decide a thing out of its order, or until it is reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, League Island, Pennsylvania: For one clerk, at $1,400; one writer and telegraph operator, at $1,000; one messenger, at $2 per diem; one foreman laborer, at $4 per diem; in all, $4,278.

Mr. BINGHAM. At the close of the paragraph in reference to the navy-yard, League Island, Pennsylvania, I desire to ask if that is the paragraph in the bill where an amendment can be introduced with reference to the construction of a dry dock at the League Island yard? I desire to submit an amendment at the point where it is in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that is the civil establishment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, may I ask the gentleman where it would be in order? I desire to move an amendment at the part of the bill where it is in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should suppose that would come in under the head of public works. They are all yards and docks.

Mr. BINGHAM. On what page?

Mr. BOUTELLE. On page 18. It is not for me to say whether it is in order. It is for the Chair.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will state that we are now on the civil establishment, and it would not be in order to insert any item about any public work there.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will ask if the gentleman will kindly enlighten me?

Mr. BOUTELLE. So far as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs may be permitted to do so I will.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the chairman of the committee to inform me on what page?

Mr. BOUTELLE. On pages 18, 19, 20, and 21 are public works.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y.: For grading, paving, sidewalks, and sewers, $10,000; quay wall coal dock, 800 feet, $40,000; quay wall, Whitney Basin, $25,000; in all, $75,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My attention has been called to a feature in this item, and I desire that it may be passed over, in order that we may recur to it. My colleague [Mr. CUMMINGS] is looking up some data. I ask unanimous consent that it be kept open for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the paragraph just mentioned be passed over for the present. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, League Island, Pa.: For dredging and filling in, $30,000; water-closets for yard, $5,580; lightning rods and sidewalks, $2,000; in all, $37,580.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 19, in line 10, after the word "dollars."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 10, after the word "dollars" insert the words "That the sum of $200,000 be, and it is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, toward the construction and completion of a dry dock at the navy-yard, League Island, Pa., of sufficient capacity to meet all present and probable future needs, both for the naval service as well as for the auxiliary or reserve ships to be used in time of war, the total cost of said dry dock not to exceed the sum of $712,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make the point of order on that, being for an appropriation not authorized by law.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that, in the matter of the construction of dry docks in connection with the naval establishment of the Government, it has always hitherto been the course of the Committee on Naval Affairs, without any preceding legislation, to incorporate in their annual bill, as a continuing service in connection with the naval development, dry docks at the established yards of the country. In the bill which I hold in my hand, for 1887, the present dry dock at League Island Navy-

Yard was directed by legislation which was not a part of a statute, but was a part of the naval appropriation bill that came to the House.

Such has been the course of this House. It has been a matter of common notoriety that the Committee on Naval Affairs entertained and carried in their committee the establishment of three dry docks that were to have been reported in this bill without question of a point of order in committee; but upon reconsideration of the proposition, without regard to the point of order, the committee determined, for other reasons, not to make the recommendation to this House. I claim, sir, that it is a part of a continuing work in the development of the naval establishment of the Government, just the same as this committee brings into this House an increase of your Navy in these four battle ships as well as this number of torpedo boats. There is no statute for them. They are a part of the growing, continuing establishment of your Navy and your navy-yard developments as are continually going on in the Navy, as they are continuing the construction of the ships, and therefore it comes in under the rule. To clean the hull or bottom of a ship is just as necessary as to appropriate for repair or renewal of the interior of a great vessel.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the rule provides, in substance, that no appropriation shall be reported in any appropriation bill or any amendment thereof be in order except for objects previously authorized by law unless it shall be in continuation of a work or object which has been thus authorized. It has been ruled frequently that the general laws authorizing the construction of a navy permit the incorporation of an appropriation for new ships in a Naval appropriation bill for the reason that the essence of a navy is ships. There have been cases where propositions have been reported for building a dry dock in a navy-yard without a point of order being made. The only instance in which a point of order was ever made within my recollection against a provision for the construction of a dry dock was for one at Algiers, near New Orleans, where it was proposed to establish a navy-yard, and a point of order was sustained in that case on the ground that its construction was not authorized by law.

Unless a dry dock is so indispensable a part of every navy-yard that there can be no such yard without such an appurtenance, it can not properly be held that every law which authorizes the establishment of a navy-yard necessarily authorizes the erection of a dry dock, which is what must be the case in order to bring the proposed amendment within the exception of the rule. But a dry dock is not an indispensable construction in order to establish a navy-yard. There are navy-yards without as well as with dry docks. Indeed, it would be impracticable to build such dry docks as are required to handle the great steamships of to-day in every navy-yard; and if a sufficient depth of water could be commanded, only a few at remote points would be required, especially for the use of the Navy. Indeed, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] frankly admits that his object is not only to provide for naval requirements, but also to provide for the requirements of the merchant marine.

It seems to me that in so important a matter as an appropriation for a great and expensive work like a dry dock there ought to be some preliminary legislation, and that it ought not to be incorporated in an appropriation bill, especially not by an amendment not considered by any committee, on the plea that it is so essential an incident of a navy-yard that the mere authority of law establishing such a yard thereby gives authority, without further legislation, for the construction of a dry dock. I think that if it should be ruled that a dry dock may be put on a naval appropriation bill by an amendment we should probably have a great deal of difficulty hereafter with reference to propositions of that nature. A dry dock does not appear to be an essential part of a navy-yard, and unless the construction of it has been authorized by existing law I do not think it can be held to be authorized merely by previous legislation establishing a navy-yard. Unless a dry dock is so essential and necessary a part of a navy-yard that you can not have a navy-yard without it I think it would be a strained construction of our rules which would hold that an appropriation for a new dry dock, not existing at this time, may be put upon an appropriation bill by way of an amendment.

I trust that we shall not have a ruling of that nature, but that when so important a matter as a dry dock not essential to a navy-yard is to be provided for and is to be placed even within the limits of a navy-yard some preliminary authorization by law will be required. Let the proposition be considered on its own merits and authorized by law before we appropriate for it in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to ask the gentleman this question: Are there any dry docks built by the Government that are not in navy-yards?

Mr. DINGLEY. No; of course not. Of course the Government would not build dry docks outside of its navy-yards.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then is not a dry dock essential and a part of a continuing work, when by legislation you have authorized the construction of war vessels and when you have no dry docks wherein you can dock those vessels?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is not necessary that every navy-yard should have a dry dock.

Mr. BINGHAM. Every navy-yard has one.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think not; certainly not such dry docks as a modern battle ship requires. A dry dock is not an indispensable part of a navy-yard. Dry docks of the magnitude required by the existing vessels of our Navy will not be constructed except at a few points and are not an essential part of every navy-yard. It seems to me clear that there ought to be some previous authority of law before we are called upon to appropriate $250,000 to start such a dry dock as is proposed, which will of course cost a great deal more before it is completed. I trust that the proposition will be brought in upon its own merits and will not be hurriedly placed on an appropriation bill on the plea that it is authorized by existing law, when in fact there is no existing law authorizing it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am placed in rather a peculiar position regarding this amendment offered by my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This district which he represents in the great State of Pennsylvania, which is closely connected in part by its maritime interests with the League Island Navy-Yard, asks for an appropriation of $200,000 for a dry dock there. Representing a district on tidewater contiguous to Philadelphia and League Island, and, in part, the State of Pennsylvania, I naturally would cordially support such a proposition. But the matter of dry docks was before the Committee on Naval Affairs and was thoroughly traversed there, and I believe I reveal no committee secrets, at least I do not wish to do so, when I say that there was a quasi understanding that we would press none of these propositions for dry docks; because if the general question should be raised, of course each member who wished a dry dock in his district would naturally desire an item for one.

I take it that the point of order raised by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], whose parliamentary experience is as wide and full as that of any member in the House, is not well taken by reason of the fact, partially disclosed by him in his remarks, that a dry dock is an essential component part of a navy-yard. We have no dry dock to-day, unless it be at Port Royal (and I doubt the capacity of that one), whereby the best modern battle ship that we have could be docked; and so lax, so dilatory, so shortsighted has been the Congress of the United States in making appropriations in the past for the improvement of the approaches to the dry docks already existing that there is hardly a harbor on the coast, unless it be Portland, Me., where one of our modern vessels, the Indiana, or any vessel of that type or class contemplated by this bill to be constructed, could approach the dry dock to be docked. The channels of approach to many of these places are so shallow as to endanger any such vessel on its way to any one of these docks, as we know by the recent history of the attempt to get the Indiana into the Port Royal dock. For the dock in my own State at League Island, I will say, and I am sorry to have to say it, that large vessels can not get to League Island until the channel of the Delaware is deepened and improved.

Mr. BINGHAM. All of which will be done in less than a year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. True, it may be done, and I hope it will be done, and I shall help all in my power. It is putting the cart before the horse to appropriate for the dry docks before deepening the river.

Mr. BINGHAM. You do not build a dry dock in a day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. True. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself have no contention regarding this appropriation, which I will most cordially support but for the reason I have stated in connection with the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

In this connection I wish to say that I was called home last week to attend the primaries and convention in my own county. All Congressmen repair to those places when they expect a renomination; they go into "dock" themselves for repair or to get ready for future action. On that occasion a correspondent here of a daily newspaper of the city of Philadelphia, animated by a desire which I have been informed is in accord with his orders (at least formerly) from the proprietors of the newspaper, to "roast" me whenever it could be done, stated that it was due to my absence from Washington that a dry dock was lost to the city of Philadelphia. I wish to say that this correspondent used the truth with most economical frugality when he made that statement, and that I had an arrangement with the chairman of the committee [Mr. BOUTELLE] to be called here by telegraph at any time to be present when my vote was essential either for the interests of Philadelphia, of my own district, or those of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. If this point of order should be sustained, there will of course be no question about this amendment of the gentleman from Philadelphia; but I am cordially in favor of the amendment. I am in favor of a dry dock at Philadelphia and would do all in my power to have one there, provided the door is opened by the committee or in any other way to go into that question. But as I understand it the members of the committee stand together upon the question of dry docks, and no appropriations for such a purpose will be made so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to an inadvertent error in a table published as a part of the report, and which may have caused some misunderstanding. My attention has just been called to the fact that in a tabulated statement prepared some time ago and inserted in the report, showing appropriations under the different bureaus and for different public works, there is an error arising from the fact that provisions for dry docks at Algiers, La., at Mare Island, Cal., and at Portsmouth, N. H., which should have been struck out have erroneously been included. No such appropriations are in the bill nor is any amount for such a purpose included in the appropriations carried by the bill. At one time the committee contemplated making these appropriations; and in making up a tabulated statement at that time these items were inserted. In preparing the report I inadvertently incorporated a copy of this tabulated statement from which these items had not been stricken out, as they should have been.

I repeat, that some gentlemen may possibly have been misled by this table on page 4 of the report, which contains $100,000 to begin a dry dock at Algiers, $100,000 for a dry dock at Portsmouth, N. H., and also a provision for a dry dock at Mare Island, Cal.

It may be proper at this time to say that the committee gave very careful consideration to this whole matter of dry docks. We found that if we should enter upon the construction of such works this year the committee would almost inevitably be obliged to report in favor of quite a number of those enterprises. In view of the situation it was not deemed wise or necessary that we should enter upon such works at this time.

The Secretary of the Navy in his annual report reviewed the suggestions, requests, and appeals in behalf of dry docks at these various points, but he strongly recommended that we should not enter upon any of these works at the present time. I will state to the committee that the situation in regard to dry docks to-day is simply this——

Mr. BARRETT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman from Maine now discussing the point of order raised by his colleague?

Mr. BOUTELLE. "The gentleman from Maine" is not occupying the floor for any purpose that is objectionable to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I will explain the matter later.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought it was proper to call attention to an error which as chairman of the committee I had inadvertently made in the preparation of the report.

Mr. BARRETT. So long as the gentleman from Maine confined his remarks to that question of order, I did not rise to make any point, but when he diverged to take up the question of the utility of dry docks and the opinions of the Secretary of the Navy on the advisability of building them, I confess I was unable to see the exact application of those remarks to the point of order.

I desire now to submit a few words upon the question of order. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has raised the point of order that this amendment is contrary to the rules of the House. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a decision given here in the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress. An amendment was offered to the Naval appropriation bill proposing the construction of some new vessels; and that eminent Democratic statesman, who does not now honor this House by his presence, Hon. William S. Holman of Indiana, raised the point of order that the amendment was in violation of the rule which has been cited at this time by the gentleman from Maine. The present Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Herbert, at that time a member of this House, in discussing the point of order, made this statement:

The point of order is not well taken. This amendment does not change any law. It simply proposes to make an appropriation of money in accordance with existing law providing for a further increase of the Navy.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the language which follows. Said Mr. Herbert further:

I claim we have the right to appropriate money for new ships; we have the right to appropriate money to be used in machine shops, in navy-yards, for machinery, or for guns, or for ships. Whoever supposed it was necessary to pass a special law authorizing the purchase of ordnance, or for the purchase of any one of these things I have mentioned? There is power under the general law for all such purposes. We have the right by virtue of the general law. All that is required is appropriation of money.

That was the opinion of the present Secretary of the Navy.

Later on in the same debate the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, in giving his decision, quoted from a decision which had been made by the distinguished Speaker, at present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle. Here is his language:

In the Forty-sixth Congress (Mr. Carlisle in the chair) it was decided "that appropriations for public works and objects" already in progress could be included in general appropriation bills or could be inserted as amendments; and that the word "objects" meant something in addition to the word "works," and must be held to include the public Departments of the Government, and the civil, military, and naval establishments recognized by law and supported by the Government. The Government has undertaken to maintain and is annually maintaining a naval establishment, and under the rule appropriations may be made for it in a general appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman state what he reads from?

Mr. BARRETT. From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the date?

Mr. BARRETT. February 26, 1887.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] suggests that dry docks are not an essential part of the Navy. If they are not, what are? Dry docks are as essential as machine shops or as crews. Not one of our modern vessels can keep the sea over six months without being docked. We have three already. We need one at every first-class yard. Certainly one is just as essential as any other part of the apparatus for keeping our naval vessels in repair.

Now, the Committee on Naval Affairs, if the point of order is well taken, has itself apparently violated it several times in the presentation of the bill we are now considering. The bill proposes, for instance, two new dwelling houses for the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that if there is authority of law to provide for an increase of the dwelling houses at the Naval Academy, there is precisely the same authority of law to provide for the extension of the dry docks in the yards where they already exist.

It is also provided in this bill that 1,000 additional men may be enlisted in the United States Navy, and I undertake to say that if you can vote new ships, and new men to man the new ships, you are equally justified, and precisely by the same logic, in providing for new dry docks.

I wish also to make the point, if the Chair will permit me, that this is not by any means new work, but is to be fairly called and is in fact an extension of an old work already in progress. The Government has a dry dock already at Philadelphia. The Committee on Naval Affairs might without question bring in an appropriation bill to expend money in the repairs of this dry dock. There is no doubt of that. Now, if in the wisdom and judgment of Congress it is believed to be cheaper and more economical, in order to carry out the existing provisions of law, there should be a dry dock at League Island, then, instead of expending money for the expenses or repairs of the dock already in existence, it is proper, and on precisely the same principle that you authorize the construction of new dwelling houses at the Military Academy, to make provision for a new dry dock which will be sufficient to meet the requirements of our modern war ships.

If Congress has the right, as it undoubtedly has, to maintain the existing dry dock, but deems that it would be cheaper and better and more economical to make the expenditure for the construction of a new dock rather than for the maintenance of the old one, I claim that it is strictly within the rule and not subject to the point of order.

I have no special interest, Mr. Chairman, in the construction of the dry dock at Philadelphia any more than any other citizen of the United States, except that it is my desire that the House shall have some right to consider legislation that it believes to be just and proper, unhampered by technical constructions of a rule.

But if the provision is inserted in the bill for the dry dock at Philadelphia, I shall move to insert a provision also providing for the construction of a dry dock at the city of Boston. We have already a dry dock there which is entirely obsolete and unsuited for the needs of our modern vessels. You could not spend money enough upon it to make it available to dock a vessel for the new Navy. Yet the Government of the United States provided years ago for a dock suitable for the needs of that yard. A new dock is in effect a maintenance of the one already authorized. It is not new legislation in any legitimate sense of the term.

Because the Government has already provided that the dock shall exist, it has power to preserve it and repair it and put it in shape to meet all modern requirements, the cheapest way to do which is to construct a new one rather than repair the old. A new dry dock at Boston is an imperative necessity to any comprehensive plan for the preservation of our Navy and its efficiency in time of war.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I dislike exceedingly to interrupt the gentleman, but he is departing widely from the point of order——

Mr. BARRETT. Referring again to the point of order——

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). And I only call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that there are some people in Washington, notwithstanding his opinion on the point of order, who are competent to discuss these questions and understand them as well as gentlemen from the far East.

Mr. BARRETT. Referring again to the point of order—and I should not be so bold as to suggest that I could add a mite to the vast stock of information and knowledge of my friend from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]—but referring again to the point of order, I submit that the decision I referred to, made on the 26th day of February, 1887, an extract from which I have already read in the hearing of the committee, is entirely pertinent to the pending question, and it is exactly on all fours with the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Chair allow a single authority to be suggested in this connection?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the first session of the Fifty-second Congress, when the naval appropriation bill was before the House, under the paragraph for "Increase of the Navy," Mr. Holman raised the point of order as to the paragraph that that provision was out of order. General debate ran with Mr. Herbert, now the Secretary of the Navy; Mr. BOUTELLE, and others identified on the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which he is now chairman, together with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], and in the course of a discussion the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] submitted:

The gentleman will allow me to cite the language of Mr. Cox:

"Without reference to other decisions made from the Chair, either in Committee of the Whole or otherwise, the present occupant of the Chair is informed that the Speaker of the House on a former appropriation bill held that an appropriation for the construction of a new vessel was in continuation of the general object of maintaining the Navy; and that decision of the Speaker runs on all fours with the decision which the Chair now makes when he overrules the point of order."

Mr. Chairman, the debate then widens, and the gentleman from Maine took part and made this statement:

If the gentleman will pardon me—

Says the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] in response to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman]—

he is hardly justified in stating as broadly as he does that the rulings of the House have been against the building of dockyards.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, undoubtedly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. That is not the case. The question has been brought up here and repeatedly decided that an appropriation for constructing a dry dock at an existing navy-yard was in order under this rule, and we have appropriated time out of mind on our bills for just such structures.

The gentleman having been on the Committee on Naval Affairs since he has been in Congress, fourteen or sixteen years, doubtless means his long and honorable service as "time out of mind"—many years. The debate runs on. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], replying to Mr. Holman, says:
